Mr. JOHN W. HOWE called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then put, upon a division, and, there were 52 ayes and 84 noes.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What necessity is there for the printing of this number of maps?

Mr. RIDDLE. I will state, for the information of the House, that we have already ordered the printing of six thousand extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey in addition to the usual number authorized by law—fifteen hundred and twenty. The committee thought they had no right to contract for the engraving of extra sets of maps without an order from the House, and they have directed me, therefore, to offer the resolution just read. The Senate have ordered the printing of ten thousand extra copies, and the extra numbers ordered by the House can be had much cheaper by being lithographed at the same time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The remarks of the gentleman, so far as they have proceeded, give me the information I wanted. I will ask another question, whether this resolution will interfere at all with the electrotyping now adopted by the Coast Survey?

Mr. RIDDLE. I will answer the gentleman's inquiry as far as I am able. In contracting for lithographing, we are compelled to give the contractor the copper plates made at great expense by the Coast Survey office. The lithographer transfers to stone the impressions from the copper plates in the cheapest possible manner. It is not for us to say how he shall do it, but only to contract for its being done well and cheaply. A mistake was made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Does not this resolution, giving rise to debate, lie over?

Mr. RIDDLE. The Chair has already decided that question. This is a privileged committee, and can make its report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RIDDLE. A contract has been entered into by the Senate with a gentleman in New York, the lithographing to be executed by him under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. The Committee on Engraving thought it proper that a like agreement should be made for the lithographing of the maps for the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What disposition is to be made of these lithographs?

Mr. RIDDLE. They are to accompany the report, and the report would be useless without them.

Mr. STEPHENS. What has become of the engravings which accompany the survey—done by the electrotyping process?

Mr. RIDDLE. They have merely struck off a few copies.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, that these maps are engraved upon copper at the office of the Coast Survey. Now, it is proposed that there shall be a number of copies of these maps printed, but it is not proposed that they shall be printed from copper-plates, because it is impossible that within a reasonable time, and at a reasonable expense, the work can be done in this manner. The copper-plates are sent off to New York, or some other city, where there is a lithographing establishment, and impressions from the copper are to be transferred upon stone.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is that by order of the Coast Survey?

Mr. HAMMOND. It is by their order, and they are executing the work in that way. The Senate copy is now executed in that way. The copper plates are in New York, and impressions from them are transferred to stone, because it is done a great deal cheaper and more rapidly. As to the electrotyping to which the gentleman refers, if he knows anything about its operations, he knows that it is a very expensive operation, and requires much time.

Mr. STEPHENS. The other day, when a proposition was made by the Committee on Printing to print this extra number of the report of the Coast Survey, the chairman of the committee stated to the House, that the Coast Survey office could print these maps at one dollar a set, by the electrotyping process, and I believe at ninety-two cents. The gentleman now says that the electrotyping is very expensive. I believe the Superintendent of the Coast Survey represents it as very cheap. I have seen them electrotype, and I think it is about one fifth cheaper than engraving. Why, then, should we get these coast-survey maps engraved? I am not certain that it is not cheaper than the price I mentioned, but the House has ordered this large number of extra copies, upon the ground that we could get them at ninety-three cents a set.

Mr. RIDDLE. You may get them much less by lithographing, as low as seventy-five cents.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee, whether it is his intention to take this map-making out of the Coast Survey?

Mr. RIDDLE. It has always been taken from their hands; but they have superintended the execution of the work.

Mr. EVANS. I merely wish to say that electrotyping is not engraving or printing. It is a process of making a copy of the copper-plate. It is not the process for printing at all. It is the preparation of an engraved plate from another engraved plate by the galvanic process.

Mr. STEPHENS. The electrotyping is simply a reproduction of an engraved plate so as to prevent the retouch of the plate by the artist. This has been done by a discovery made in the Coast Survey office. The original copper-plate first made by the artist is reproduced by a chemical process. That is electrotyping. Now what I mean by electrotyping is making prints from the electrotype of the plate thus produced. What I wish to know of the Committee on Engraving is, whether it is the object to have these impressions made upon a principle different from that the Coast Survey has now established?

Mr. HAMMOND. The officers of the Coast Survey desire this course should be taken. They desire that these plates shall be lithographed, and that they shall not be printed from the original copper-plates, or copper-plates produced by the process to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has alluded. They desire this, because it is a cheaper mode of publishing than from the copper-plates, or by the process to which the gentleman has referred. It is a cheaper process, because the impression is transferred upon stone rapidly, whereas it requires a number of days under the other mode, and a new copper-plate. I do not know that I understand exactly the point to which the gentleman from Georgia refers, but if he supposes that it is the object of the committee to interfere with the duties of the officers of the Coast Survey, he is mistaken. Under the rules of the House, the Committee on Engraving are bound to report to the House, whenever maps of any kind are to be published, whether they be engraved or not. Now I do not propose to take any course which will not be advisable, and which the officers of the Coast Survey have not pointed out themselves. Their plates have actually gone on to New York for the use of the Senate, and they are now transferring from copper-plates to stone the impressions from which the maps are to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to make another inquiry of the gentleman. Can he inform the House what will be the cost of one of these impressions?

Mr. HAMMOND. A friend near me says it will not cost exceeding seventy-five cents. I knew nothing of this resolution until my friend [Mr. RIDDLE] showed it to me. The cost is less than was expected in the debate the other day.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then there is another question I wish to ask the gentleman. Is it the object of the Committee on Engraving that some of these copies of the Coast Survey shall be engraved upon steel and others lithographed?

Mr. HAMMOND. It is intended that all shall be lithographed.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the committee inform me what the Coast Survey are making so many of these electrotypes now for?

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not know that they are.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have seen them making a number of them.

Mr. EVANS. I will answer the gentleman. The engraved plates of the Coast Survey office are for the large charts—some of them as large as a blanket. You do not propose to put these into a small document. The copper-plate printing requires to be done under a roller, and the most rapid copper-plate printer can produce only a very few impressions in a day. The lithographs, however, can be produced in great numbers in a day, like the ordinary mode of printing, and at a much cheaper rate than by the use of copper-plates. The large electrotypes prepared in the Coast Survey office are for the great charts. They take these charts and reduce the size, so you can get them into a small document.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] then, that these lithographs are for one class?

Mr. EVANS. What I meant was this: The plates prepared for the use of navigators are large plates printed from copper, and those which are to be prepared for the document we print for distribution are outline sketches showing the general progress of the Coast Survey. They do not show the minutiae, and are not intended as a guide to navigators, but show the great progress of the survey for the consideration of the House. The large plates, as the gentleman from Georgia has seen, enter into the most minute particulars, and are intended for the practical use of navigators.

Mr. RIDDLE. I will state, for the information of the gentleman, it is the desire of the Coast Survey, and the interest of the Government, to retain or preserve the copper-plates prepared at the Coast Survey office. If all the impressions are made from copper-plates, they will be worthless at the last, whereas in future they may be required.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have but a word to say further, and then I will take my seat. It was my understanding the other day, when the Committee on Public Printing made their report, that the Coast Survey intended to make all these maps and charts by this new process of electrotyping. I barely wish to know, whether it is their intention to keep up that process still at an expense to the Government of 93 cents per copy, and also a contract for lithographing the same? I ask the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] who seems to be acquainted with this subject, whether that is the object?

Mr. SACKETT. I understand that the large charts or maps are made for the practical benefit of navigators. Now, what is the object and purpose of these outline maps? If they do not answer that purpose, why do we make them?

Mr. EVANS. I shall take about ten minutes, perhaps not more than five, in answering the inquiries of gentlemen, and in making the proper explanation. The maps printed by the Coast Survey are prepared by what is called the electrotype process. And if there is any gentleman here who does not understand it, I would advise him to go over to the office and look at it, for it is one of the most beautiful chemical operations, worthy the attention of any intelligent gentleman. These maps are sold in bookstores from ten cents to forty cents each. The English Government in the same way print the Nautical Almanac, which costs there say two dollars a copy, but which you can purchase in this country for one dollar. The English print, moreover, large numbers of charts which are sold I believe much beneath cost. These charts, as I observed before, are minute to the utmost degree. They contain every important position, the location of shoals, and directions for entering harbors, and all the leading lines, and bearings from point to point, so that when any navigator arrives upon the coast, he can make out his position without difficulty.

These charts never have been printed for the use of Congress, and never ought to be. It would be an enormous job. They are printed and sold to navigators by the Government of the United States. But the report of the Coast Survey contains what we cannot get out of the charts. It contains a large number of astronomical and geographical positions; it gives the latitude and longitude of important points; it describes the progress of the Coast Survey; it tells how the parties have been engaged; how the work has advanced since last year; how they have expended the money voted to them; and everything which is usually contained in a report, so as to enable the members of the House of Representatives to vote intelligently on the propositions submitted to them. However, in order to illustrate any report which concerns mathematical and geographical positions it is of course necessary to accompany the report with maps. Everybody knows that. It is necessary that the child at school should be taught geography by maps. These coast survey reports are a sort of treatises on geography, and they therefore require slight sketch maps, which are admirable, as far as they extend, but which do not extend to the minutiae required in the large charts.

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to know if the gentleman is advocating the doctrine, that under the power which we have to furnish such conveniences as the commerce of the country may require, we can furnish charts and maps to schools and colleges?

Mr. EVANS. I am doing no such thing; and if I had been doing it, I might be doing worse than desiring to bring information home to every child in the land. I venture to say, that the gentleman's own constituents might profit by it, if we only sent them the New Testament. [A laugh.] But I was not talking about any such thing. I was answering the inquiry of the gentleman, who desired to know why these small charts were furnished. Now, if we were to use the electrotype plates of the Coast Survey office, and if the maps were to be prepared from those plates, and bound up with the report, the expense would be incalculable.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman, I will remind him, and particularly the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] of a fact. It was stated in the debate on a former day that the maps for each one of these copies would cost ninety-two cents, and it now appears that they will cost only seventy-five cents. The House, in adopting the former resolution, virtually adopted this one, although they believed the work would cost more.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Did not similar maps accompany the report of the last year?

Mr. EVANS. Certainly; and for every former year. It is not a new proposition. Ever since Mr. Hassler took charge of the Coast Survey, and during the whole time it has been under the charge of Mr. Bache, maps have always accompanied the report, and they are indispensably necessary to elucidate it. We have been in the habit for many years past of printing the journals of officers who have traversed the western country—California and New Mexico, and of accompanying them not only with maps and charts, but with views and likenesses of Indians, got up at an enormous expense, and not at all necessary to the elucidation of the works. I am confident that if gentlemen will look into the matter, they will find that these maps are indispensably necessary. They are not put in for show, for they are not showy maps at all. Nor are they put in to show how deeply scientific they are; that is done in the large maps; they are merely for the elucidation of the report.

Now, I wish to say a word to the House in regard to the way in which these surveys are made. I see a gentleman before me who knows perfectly well how things are done, and who will correct me if I am in error. I mean the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. RIDGLE,] whom I have known for a long time, and who is well acquainted with the process. In making marine surveys, the earth is regarded as a flat surface—a plane, but everybody knows that it is not so; and therefore, in making geodetical surveys it is necessary to take the rotundity of the earth into account. In carrying on the coast survey of the United States, in the first place, the whole country is divided into certain triangles. A great deal of care is required to present those triangles properly. No single angle of a triangle must be too obtuse, none too acute. They should be as nearly as possible equilateral. These triangles are then plotted down on one of these charts, and as every angular point of every triangle is an absolute, correctly ascertained position in the country, if any gentleman has one in his district, he has an absolute position ascertained there with reference to every other part of the earth's surface. These charts will be highly useful to persons preparing maps of counties, as they show what their geographical position is with regard to other places. These small maps, which can be lithographed at very slight expense, contain a great deal of very valuable geographical information necessary to the elucidation of the report and to enable Congress to understand it.

There is this difficulty about electrotyping, that the printing from copper plates requires to be done by a peculiar press with rollers. Each plate requires to be carefully arranged. It requires skill in the operator, and only a few copies can be struck off in the course of a day. But where you use lithographic plates, you can use an ordinary press. It is the same difference as that between copper-plates and wood-cuts. The wood-cuts are easily done, because they are inserted amongst the types; but if you have copper-plates, it must all be done by rollers, and therefore, if the Coast Survey office undertake to use copper-plates instead of lithography, it will subject the House to very great expense.

These plates are necessary for the elucidation of the report. They ought not to be copper plates on the large scale, because they would be too minute for that purpose, and would cost too much; they ought not to be copper-plates on the small scale, because of the difficulty of printing; but they ought to be lithographed, because that can be done with the usual press-work, and is, at any rate, much cheaper.

In conclusion, let me say that, as was suggested by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] this is no new thing introduced to inveigle Congress, but an old-established thing; and further, as was stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] the maps in each copy of the report will cost only seventy-five cents, instead of ninety-two cents, as was supposed when the subject was last before the House.

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to ask my friend from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] one question in relation to this engraving. I find, on examination, that there is a large number of maps in the document room connected with the Coast Survey. I wish to know whether they are the same with those which it is proposed to engrave? I will send some specimens to the gentleman from Maryland, so that he may be able to answer my interrogatory.

Mr. EVANS. They are not. The maps to which the gentleman has called my attention were not prepared by the Coast Survey office at all.

Mr. FICKLIN. Who were they prepared by, then?

Mr. EVANS. I think they were prepared under the direction of the Navy Department. When these come to be compared with those which we now propose to publish, I think there will be found some difference. I am a judge of maps.

Mr. FICKLIN. In looking over the document room I found some two-horse wagon loads of maps there of this species.

Mr. EVANS. I hope the gentleman will let me keep the maps he has sent to me. I hope he intended to send them to me as a present.

Mr. VENABLE. The charts which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] has presented here, are nautical charts, and are very unsatisfactory. Those which we propose to publish are geodetic charts, which, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] has informed us, make allowance for the shape of the earth, which is spheroidal. Nautical charts were prepared by order of the Government as far back as 1805, but they are delusive. They are not accurate, because, not being constructed upon the actual spheroidal shape of the earth, each detached map may be accurate, but when placed by others do not fit—one overlaps the other, and the channels are not therefore correctly marked with reference to one another. These maps are made with reference to the triangulation of which my friend from Maryland speaks. The larger and smaller triangulation present to you the precise shape of our coast over the whole extent where the surveys have been completed. Now, it does seem extraordinary that any difficulty should be raised upon this subject. Look at the whole of our Pacific, as well as our Atlantic coast! These charts are prepared by a corps of the most accomplished scholars, comprising practical engineers—gentlemen educated in the Navy—gentlemen skilled in the science of hydrography—gentlemen educated at West Point—gentlemen skilled in the science of topography—all of them men of the highest attainments, who have been employed for a long time on our coast, and are in every respect qualified for the execution of a work demanding the highest scientific attainments. And the charts which they have constructed from their own observations are complete and accurate. The nautical charts which have been heretofore constructed are taken upon the principle that the earth is a plane, flat surface. They will, therefore, be incomplete and inaccurate. Now, every gentleman here knows that the effect of mistaking a few feet one side or the other of a channel may be the loss of the vessel and all it contains. But these charts give every point with such accuracy that there can be no mistake, and in the absence even of a pilot may give the means of a safe approach to a harbor.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Since Congress have ordered six thousand copies of those charts to be printed I have received two letters from gentlemen of great experience, saying that the use of those charts would enable them to enter any port covered by them, without the aid of a pilot, they were so accurate.

Mr. VENABLE. There is no question about it, as I have before remarked; it is reduced to a demonstrative certainty. It is a mathematical ascertainment of the locality of a channel, and the charts being constructed with reference to the shape of the earth, there can be no mistake as to their accuracy. If you will consult a mariner—any man skillful in the business of sea-faring life, he will tell you that mere nautical charts are often very inaccurate upon the most important points, while in a geodetic chart showing the triangulation, the hydrography, and the topography of the coast gives it absolute certainty, as to the locality of the channel in every point, and every circumstance connected with it; and as the gentleman from Maryland has remarked, with the aid of those charts any navigator can enter any one of our ports with safety, without any other aid.

Mr. FICKLIN. In reply to the request of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] that I would present to him the maps which I sent him a moment ago, I beg leave to say, that I will give them to him with all my heart; and if he wants more, he can have two horse wagon loads by going up to the document room.

Mr. EVANS. I should like to inquire of the gentleman what right he has to give them away?

Mr. FICKLIN. Why, by going up there, and selecting them, and having them brought down here.

Mr. EVANS. That is no right at all.

Mr. FICKLIN. I hold them by possession; and, as a gentleman near me suggests, by the right of discovery too. [A laugh.]

While up, I wish to say to my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] who, I am glad to see, is engaged in this subject, that a few days ago, when this subject was under discussion, he was eloquent and ardent in showing the necessity of these maps and charts. I did not then have the opportunity of showing him that in the document room a great number of these maps may be found in relation to his own State; that there is a sufficient number in regard to Cape Fear to have supplied his constituents with all the information they require, if they are correct, so that no navigator need have any fear in entering Cape Fear. [A laugh.]

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman allow me to say, that if he will look at these charts—for I have looked at them not casually, but I have examined them closely—he will find that the present observations were made by the Coast Survey, and the present charts supply all that is wanting; while he will find that the mere nautical ones, being based upon the supposition that the earth is flat, are of very little use, because inaccurate in this: suppose a nautical chart of Norfolk harbor be made, and the one of some harbor on the coast of North Carolina at eighty or a hundred miles distant, he must perceive that no reference being had to the spheroidal shape of the earth, they must be inaccurate in relation to each other. They were nautical surveys and entirely distinct from the system of observations taken by the Coast Survey. And that survey which he has given me, as far as the coast of North Carolina was concerned, was far from being a complete one. They surveyed Cape Fear, but they did not survey the whole coast. It is the misfortune of North Carolina that her coast is one of the most dangerous in the United States, and much more so formerly than now, because of the want of such observations as are now in progress. But little has been expended on that coast, whilst the bounties of the Treasury have been poured out with a liberal hand on the Northern Atlantic and Lake coasts of the United States, with channels ascertained and shoals marked by lights which shine like stars on the dark waters, yes, sir, in constellations, our coast has been neglected, and the perils of navigation greatly increased. The progress of the coast survey off North Carolina, conducted by the distinguished Superintendent and his accomplished assistants, have in a great measure removed the difficulty, and pointed out the channels which render navigation practicable and safe.

The engineers employed in the Coast Survey at present have not completed the whole coast from Cape Fear to Charleston, and the work is in progress, and along the coast of Georgia. They have published a portion of these charts. But I will say to my friend, in order that he may have some idea of the value of this work, that the knowledge heretofore possessed of this coast was so imperfect and so unsatisfactory, that it was impossible to get a vessel insured at any reasonable rate which was bound for this coast; but since the work has been completed under the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, these difficulties have been removed in a great measure, and insurance can easily be effected. The difficulties upon the shore of North Carolina have been so far removed, that although it has been heretofore regarded as a most dangerous coast, yet vessels are now enabled to enter our ports often without the aid of a pilot. This has been the result so far as that coast is concerned. Now, I am sure that my friend will not hesitate for the expense of a small appropriation, when millions of money and the lives of thousands of men are at risk. I should be as unwilling as any one to vote unnecessary appropriations for this or for any other purpose; but wise economy is always liberal. Who has a more perfect right to protection than the hardy mariner, whose enterprise binds the four quarters of the world together in commercial intercourse? Whose life should be more dear to the country than his who brings comfort, luxury and wealth to our shores? Whose life of daring and of danger is of such inestimable value to every branch of industry in our land? Commerce is the right arm of the country; all that can be done to invigorate and strengthen it should be the statesman's care. Knowledge, scientific, accurate knowledge, builds the most enduring monuments which perpetuate the memory of the statesman's skill. The lives and the property of our sailors and merchants all demand that we should be liberal in furnishing the information which will protect them, and I am willing at any reasonable cost to furnish it. The fearful loss of lives and property produced by defective charts and unlighted shoals and rocks, and the perils of navigation incalculably increased, are demands to which we cannot be insensible or unmindful. All commercial nations are engaged in a like enterprise with ourselves, and liberally furnish all the information which they obtain. Our own Colonel Fremont, when he first visited the Pacific coast, detected by observation an error in Mercator's chart, by which San Francisco was placed several miles further on the coast than it really was, and which had caused the wreck of many vessels that ran upon the shore before they were aware of its proximity. He made the communication, and I am informed that the English Board of Admiralty had just before sent a corps of engineers to ascertain the cause of the frequent losses in that particular part of the Pacific coast. Our corps is now prosecuting the work off Oregon and California, and I trust we shall sustain the enterprise, and publish the results, until there shall not be a shoal, channel, or inlet, cape, promontory, or bay, which may not be made perfectly familiar to all whose business and occupation lead them to the dangers of the seas, that our statesmen and scholars may also learn those things so necessary to be known before they undertake to legislate or to teach.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] allow me to say a word? About two weeks ago we ordered this printing to be done. It was then stated that the cost of the whole would be about ninety-two cents. We have already ordered the printing to be done, and, as I understand it, this is a mere question of form. The Committee on Engraving thought it would be necessary for them to report, and for that reason the subject has again been brought before the House. Now, what can be the difficulty in the matter? The printing has been ordered, and the engravers must go on with the work.

Mr. GORMAN. I also desire a word of explanation. The Committee on Engraving reported upon precisely the same thing which was reported upon by the Committee on Printing. The other day I reported the cost as ninety-two cents, but it has since been ascertained that it could be done for considerably less than that amount. But the engraving of the work belongs to the Committee on Engraving, and the printing belongs to the Committee on Printing. The question remains exactly the same, so far as the House is concerned, as it did when it was up before. I hope the gentleman will call the previous question, and let us dispose of it at once.

Mr. FICKLIN. That is just what I wanted to find out, whether it is a question of form or of substance.

Mr. VENABLE. It is simply a question of form.

Mr. FICKLIN. These charts which I presented here, I think were published in 1839. Now, my friend from North Carolina rather intimates that the spheroidal shape of the earth was not then understood.

Mr. VENABLE. I merely stated the difference between nautical and geodetical charts.

Mr. FICKLIN. I understood my friend from North Carolina to intimate that it had not been ascertained by the Coast Survey and Department that the form of the earth was not a plane flat surface. He says that the information which we received in 1832 was incorrect. But if he will look into the matter he will find that a great deal of this incorrect matter was published by order of the House. A great many more numbers were printed than was necessary for distribution by the members of the House.

If the number to be printed is decided upon, and the question is one of mere form between these two committees, I have nothing more to say in regard to it; but if it involve, in any way, the publishing of a larger number than has been heretofore ordered, I am, for one, against it.

Mr. GORMAN. It does not involve a single cent more expense. It is a question relating to the duties, falling, in part, legitimately, to the Committee on Engraving, and another part to the Committee on Printing. It is the same thing heretofore decided upon, and does not involve any additional expense.

Mr. FICKLIN. I will remark, in regard to this coast survey, that it has been well said by my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] that dollars are not to be regarded in reference to it; and, indeed, they need not be counted, because it will continue from year to year and, as I apprehend, from century to century at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and there will be no end to it while this Government has a sea-coast. That being the case, and such the probability, I think it very important we should watch over this expenditure, which already is becoming very large, not to say enormous. It was suggested that the previous question should be moved; but as I do not desire to do so, I will yield the floor.

Mr. ORR moved the previous question; which received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The resolution was again read for information, and the question was then taken upon the adoption of the resolution, and it was agreed to.

WABASH RIVER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, entitled "A bill to grant to the States of Indiana and Illinois a portion of the public lands therein, for the improvement of the River Wabash;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. DOTY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, entitled "A bill to establish a public printing office, and to provide for the appointment of a Superintendent of Public Printing;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF AMERICAN CONSULS.

Mr. SACKETT, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution; which was read for information, as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the powers and duties of American Consuls and Commercial Agents in relation to American seamen, mariners, officers, and commanders of merchant vessels of the citizens of the United States, in foreign ports and places; and to bring in a bill to more completely define and establish such powers and duties.

Mr. SACKETT. If the House will allow me one word upon that resolution, I presume there will be no objection to it.

Voices. "Hear!" "Hear!"

Mr. S. (continuing.) There is a claim now before Congress, of a considerable amount, arising out of the exercise of very doubtful powers of one of our consuls, and it is for the purpose of having and obtaining a competent committee to examine into their power and duties, that I ask the adoption of this resolution.

*The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ORR moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion was agreed to; and the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN gave notice, under the rule, of his intention to introduce a bill amendatory of the act approved September 9th, 1850, entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico."

Mr. ALLISON gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, or on some subsequent day, introduce a bill granting one million of acres of land to the State of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of aiding the Pittsburg and Erie Railroad Company in constructing their road.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. MEADE: The petition of the heirs of Captain Joshua Frepton, praying for commutation pay.

Also, the petition of David Toole, praying for a pension in consideration of injuries received while in the service of the United States during the late war.

By Mr. ALLISON: The petition of sundry citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, praying that the carrying and delivery of the mail on the Christian Sabbath, or Lord's day, be prohibited.

Also, two petitions from citizens of Western Pennsylvania, for a ship canal around the falls of Sainte Marie's river.

By Mr. ASHE: The memorials of Dickson Mallard and Carlton Hall, deputy marshals, praying additional compensation for taking the census.

INDIAN SUPERINTENDENCY IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill to provide for the appointment of a Superintendent of Indian affairs in California, to report a substitute, by way of amendment, for the whole bill, and to request the Senate to act upon it immediately. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that no Senator will object to the consideration of the bill at this time. California is the only portion of the territory of the United States without a Superintendent of Indian affairs. This bill is to provide for the appointment of such an officer.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. The substitute of the Committee on Indian Affairs provides that the 6th section of the act of May 6th, 1822, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the Indian frontier,' approved 30th March, 1802;" also, the 5th section of an act approved April 25th, 1824, entitled "An act to enable the President to hold treaties with certain Indian tribes," be revived and extended to the State of California, for the purpose of establishing a Superintendency of Indian affairs for that State; and that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be authorized to appoint a Superintendent of Indian affairs to reside in said State, who shall possess the same powers and be subject to the same duties as the Superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis, Missouri.

It further provides that the said Superintendent of Indian affairs shall have an annual salary not exceeding _____. That he shall be allowed a clerk, whose compensation shall not exceed _____ per annum.

Mr. ATCHISON. The Senate will perceive that the bill proposes to create the office of Superintendent of Indian affairs for the State of California. I presume there will be no objection to that. The only question is as to the amount of compensation. I move to fill the first blank with "$5,000," and the second blank with "$2,500;" so that the salary of the Superintendent shall not exceed $5,000, nor that of the clerk $2,500.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to, and the amendment as amended was adopted. The bill was then reported to the Senate, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

TENURE OF ARMY APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that all commissions in the Army of the United States hereafter shall be for a limited time, which shall be expressed in the commissions.

DISCIPLINE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. BADGER. I gave notice yesterday that I should ask the Senate to take up the bill, reported by me from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the naval service of the United States, and dispose of it this morning. I rise for the purpose of submitting that motion now. I would say to the Senate, that the bill as reported is precisely the same as the one which passed the Senate with great unanimity at the last session. It is highly important that it should be acted on immediately, as squadrons are now preparing to go to sea; and it is highly important that the officers should carry with them some lawful authority to enforce discipline. I hope, then, that there will be no objection to taking up and disposing of the bill this morning. I move to postpone the prior orders, and take up that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read the second time; and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment proposed to strike out the following, which immediately succeeds the enacting clause:

"That summary courts-martial may be ordered upon petty officers, and persons of inferior ratings, by the commander of any vessel in the Navy, for the trial of offences which he may deem deserving of greater punishment than the commander of a vessel is, by the act approved twenty-third April, eighteen hundred, now authorized to inflict of his own authority, but not sufficient to require trial by general court-martial."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That summary courts-martial shall consist of three commissioned officers and of some person competent to act as recorder: Provided, That in cases where commissioned officers cannot be detailed for such service, said court may be composed of any officers of or above the rank of passed midshipman. Before proceeding to trial, the members shall take the following oath or affirmation, which the recorder is hereby authorized to administer:

"I, A, B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will well and truly try, without prejudice or partiality, the case now pending, according to the evidence which shall be adduced, the laws for the government of the Navy, and my own conscience."

"After which the recorder of the court shall take the following oath or affirmation, which the senior member of the court shall administer: 'I, A, B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will keep a true record of the evidence which may be given before this court, and of the proceedings thereof.'"

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the commander of a ship shall have authority to order any officer under his command to act as the recorder of a summary court-martial."

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all testimony given before such court shall be given orally, on oath or affirmation, which the senior member of the court shall administer."

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That summary courts-martial may sentence petty officers, and persons of inferior ratings, to the following punishments:

And insert the following:

"That the commander of any vessel in the Navy, or of any shore station, shall have authority to punish offences committed by petty officers and persons of inferior ratings, by any one or more of the following punishments, to wit:

"1. By diminishing their rations; by restricting their diet to bread and water; by imposing extra police and other duties; and in cases of theft, in addition to any of the foregoing punishments, by making good from the wages of the offender to the owner the value of the article or articles stolen, and obliging the offender to wear, for any time not exceeding ten days, a badge with the word 'thief' thereon."

The residue of the fifth section remained unaltered, as follows:

"1st. Discharge from the service, with bad conduct discharge."

"2d. Solitary confinement in irons, single or double, on bread and water: Provided, No such confinement shall exceed thirty days."

"3d. Solitary confinement in irons, single or double, not exceeding thirty days."

"4th. Solitary confinement not exceeding thirty days."

"5th. Confinement not exceeding two months."

"6th. Reduction to next inferior rating."

"7th. Ball and chain, but not to be worn at sea."

"8th. Deprivation of liberty on shore."

"And loss of pay, not to exceed three months, may be added to any of the above-mentioned punishments."

The next amendment proposed to strike out from the sixth section these words:

"That no such sentence shall be carried into execution without the approval of the officer ordering the court, who shall have power to remit in part or altogether, but not to commute any such sentences."

It also proposed to amend the residue of the section, which is in these words, by striking out the words "by a summary court-martial:"

"And provided, That no sentence to solitary confinement shall be directed to be carried into execution until the surgeon or senior medical officer on board, at the time, has examined the prisoner and certified that it can be done without serious injury to his health; and it shall be the duty of the commander to remit the whole or any part of any sentence [by a summary court-martial,] the execution of which would, in the opinion of said surgeon or senior medical officer, produce such injury."

Sections seven, eight, and nine, remain unaltered, thus:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the commander of every ship or vessel in the Navy shall cause a conduct book to be kept, embracing every petty officer and person of inferior rating under his command, in which shall be noted every instance of meritorious or bad conduct of each man; and whenever a man is discharged, either at or before the expiration of his term of service, he shall take care that his general character be noted on his discharge, giving to those who merit them, Good Conduct Discharges; and to those who deserve them, Bad Conduct Discharges; and to those whose conduct shall merit no particular note, discharges in the usual form: Provided, That the character to be given on a discharge shall be ascertained and established under such rules as shall be prescribed by the Navy Department."

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That any petty officer, or person of inferior rating, who shall be discharged with a good conduct discharge, after a service of not less than two years, shall have a preference on reentering the service, and in advance to higher ratings over persons of similar qualifications, but who have not so served; and whenever a petty officer, or person of inferior rating, shall be transferred from one ship or station to another, his character shall be noted on the transfer roll."

"Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That every petty officer, or person of inferior rating, who shall receive a good conduct discharge, after a continuous service of not less than two years, shall, if he reenters within three months after his discharge, be entitled to a credit on the books of the ship to which he may be first ordered, of three months' wages, at his former rating; and after twenty years' service in the Navy, with good conduct discharges at the termination of each enlistment, every such petty officer or person of inferior rating shall be entitled to admission to and provision in the naval asylum for life, with half the monthly wages of his last enlistment."

The amendments proposed to strike out the tenth and eleventh sections, which are in these words:

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That commanding officers may, of their own authority, punish offences committed by petty officers, and others of inferior ratings, under their command, by solitary or other confinement; by diminishing their rations; by restricting their diet to bread and water; by imposing extra police and other duties; by withholding permission to leave the ship on liberty, when such indulgence is granted to others of the ship's company; and in case of theft not exceeding the value of five dollars, by making good from the wages of the offender to the owner, the value of the article or articles proved to have been stolen, and obliging the offender to wear, for any time not exceeding ten days, a badge with the word 'Thief;' and such commanding officer may combine any two of these punishments at his discretion. But solitary confinement thus directed shall not exceed fifteen days, nor other close confinement twenty days; nor shall any of the other punishments hereby authorized be continued for a longer time than thirty days, nor so long, as in the opinion of the surgeon, or senior medical officer present, its continuance would seriously affect the health of the offender. If the offences shall be deemed to require severe punishment, the offender may be confined, until he can be brought to trial before a court, either general or summary, or his release is ordered by proper authority."

"Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the proceedings of summary courts-martial shall be conducted with as much conciseness and precision as may be consistent with the ends of justice, and under such forms and rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President of the United States; and all such proceedings shall be transmitted, in the usual mode, to the Navy Department."

The next amendment proposed to strike out from the twelfth section the words, "to be inflicted by a summary court-martial." The section is as follows:

"Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That any punishments authorized by this act [to be inflicted by a summary court-martial,] may likewise be inflicted by any general court-martial."

Mr. BADGER. I will explain to the Senate the purpose of the amendments which have been reported. The bill, as reported from the committee, and as it passed the Senate at the last session, contemplates the establishment of summary courts-martial for the purpose of trying petty officers and persons of inferior ratings on board ships, and giving to those courts the power to inflict the punishments which are mentioned in the bill. The committee directed me—without a dissenting voice, all the members of the committee being present—to report the amendments which have just been read. The effect of them is simply to strike out from the bill the provision for summary courts-martial and to leave to the commanding officer to inflict the punishments which, in the bill, are prescribed as a substitute for the corporal punishment which was abolished by a proviso to the naval appropriation bill at the session before last. The committee were clearly of opinion, that whatever punishments the bill proposes as a substitute for corporal punishment, should be placed in the hands of the commanding officer of a vessel as indispensable to his authority and influence and control over the crew; that whatever means of discipline Congress thought proper to provide, should be put into his hands without the intermediate machinery of summary courts-martial. That is the effect of the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all commissions in the Navy of the United States hereafter shall be for the term of ten years, which shall be expressed in said commission.

I do not want to discuss it. I simply ask to have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Hale, Jones of Iowa, Sumner, and Walker—7.
NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Borland, Brodhead,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 29.

Butler, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Douglas, Downs, Fitch, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, King, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Stockton, and Wade—30.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move to strike out the words "bread and water."

The PRESIDENT. That will not be in order, as that amendment has been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move, then, to reconsider the vote on concurring with the amendment made in Committee of the Whole. You protect the sailor's back, and now I am disposed to protect the stomach. I consider the one about as respectable as the other; and I think the punishment of putting a sailor upon bread and water, although it may not be infamous, is far more severe than flogging. If I had to select a choice, I would take the flogging. [Laughter.]

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. There are many provisions of the bill, as I heard it read, of which I approve. There are other provisions to which I cannot give my assent. I cannot agree by my vote to sanction a punishment which places on the breast, or anywhere else upon the person of the American sailor, a badge of dishonor—the epithet "thief." Nor can I consent to sanction any such punishment as the "ball and chain." But satisfied as I am that all hope of amendment to this bill is vain, I simply ask for the yeas and nays on the engrossment, that I may record my vote against it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HALE. I wish to make a single inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs before the bill is passed. I see by reference to the title of the bill, that it is entitled "An act to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the naval service of the United States." With all respect to the committee, I wish to inquire whether this is all they propose to give us at this session, in order to promote good conduct in the naval service of the United States?

Mr. BADGER. As I reported this bill, I will answer the Senator from New Hampshire, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. This is not all that we propose to offer to the Senate during the present session. This is a measure indispensably required to be at once adopted as a necessary means of preserving order and discipline on board the ships of the country, while we are deliberating upon a permanent and more enlarged system. We hope to report another measure during the session.

Mr. HALE. Then I have not a word to say in opposition to this bill. I shall not oppose it. I wish simply to say, very briefly, that while I have no objection to this bill, as a temporary measure, I do hope that at some early day the Committee on Naval Affairs will furnish us with a bill which shall be permanent, and embrace everything that ought to be embraced in a bill to promote discipline and good conduct in the naval service of the United States. In my judgment, such a measure should go a great deal further than this bill goes. And one of the first and most indispensable prerequisites to promote discipline and good conduct in the naval service of the United States, is to put the naval service upon an equal footing with the merchant service. If I am not mistaken, at this time the average wages of good sailors in the merchant service of the United States are at least twenty-five per cent. in advance of those paid to the highest class of seamen in the naval service of the United States. While this is so—while the merchant service pays twenty-five per cent. more than the Government, the merchant service will always have the best sailors, and the naval service will have the dregs and refuse. That is an indispensable prerequisite, if you mean to raise the naval service.

Another thing. You should hold out, by raising the pay of seamen, inducements to young men of the first character in the country to enter the naval service. And to do that, you must offer them a higher prospect of promotion than a mere change of rating. Good conduct must have some higher reward than that holden out in this bill. There is another thing to be done, and that is, you must abolish the spirit ration. I have the experience of some officers in the naval service of the United States, who tell me that the spirit ration given to the sailors, is just exactly enough to keep alive in them an unhealthy appetite during the cruise; so that when they come into port, they have been disciplined and schooled by the Government in intemperance, just exactly enough to enable them to go on shore, and commit that which subjects them to the cruel punishments which they have to endure. In other words, you make them drunkards by law—you educate them to intemperance—you encourage them to debase and degrade themselves by the system to which you submit them, and then they are punished for it. I trust, with all deference to the Naval Committee, that they will take this view of the subject.

There are some other matters which I would like to see attended to. I do not know but that my suggestions may be considered absurd, but I wish that every ship which goes to sea under the flag of the United States should carry a well-selected and well-arranged library, by means of which every sailor disposed to inform himself, in the hours in which he may not be employed at work, should have the means at hand, by the aid of the Government, thus to improve his time. He should not be shut up by law, and the only possible excitement, physical or moral, the Government affords him is that which arises from taking the grog which you serve out to him. I think this is a suggestion which ought favorably to commend itself to the humanity of the Naval Committee.

There are many other things that I think ought to be done; and I hope that at an early day an earnest and serious effort may be made to put the Navy where it ought to be. I think this is due to the officers themselves. There are a great many naval officers throughout the country now living in the hope and expectation that the cut-and-nine-tails is to be restored. I think we owe it to them that we should record, by yeas and nays, on the journals of the Senate, what I have no doubt is the deliberate judgment of three fifths, if not of a larger majority, of this body, that it never can and never will be done. It ought to be settled by legislation that that is a fixed fact per se, that that thing never will be restored. When that is done, men and officers will conform themselves to the new state of things which they see about them. When such a bill as that shall be offered, I shall have something to say on the subject. I will not trouble the Senate now on that matter.

I wish to say, however, that I have some facts which I have gathered in detail from the reports of the Government upon this subject, by which I can show my honorable friend from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] that he is exceedingly mistaken, not only in the conclusions to which he comes, but in the premises from which he argues. One of them I will state at this moment for his especial edification. In the report which was read, I think from Mr. Engle, and one of those which the Senator from Florida gave in his speech, he mentioned that flogging on board vessels was confined to comparatively a very small number of the crew. I think he said, about twelve on board sloops, and about twenty on frigates partook of the flogging. I believe I am correct in that statement. I have looked over the returns of several of these vessels, and made somewhat of an analysis of them. I shall give to the Senate the result of one. The ship Columbus sailed out of the port of New York on the 23d of February, 1846, and returned on the 22d of February, 1849. That is a cruise of about three years; and we have only the returns of about eighteen months, or one half of the voyage. Four hundred and twenty-four floggings were administered during these eighteen months. If that number be divided between twelve or twenty men, it will give a pretty considerable portion for each. But I find that this administration of justice, though severe, was a little more equal. I find, by these returns, that one man was flogged seven times; that four men were flogged five times; that eleven men were flogged four times; that twenty men were flogged three times; that fifty-seven men were flogged twice; and that two hundred and seventy-two took it once. Two hundred and seventy-two different men were flogged once during eighteen months, or half the voyage. If there was the same proportion throughout the whole voyage, there would have been five hundred and twenty-four different men who received that punishment during one voyage. There are details of other vessels which I have in my memorandum book, which go to establish the same fact—that there is a very great mistake as to the extent to which this thing has been carried on board of vessels. I will not trouble the Senate further at this time; but I hope at some early day to have an opportunity of addressing the Senate on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say a word. I am one among the number who voted to discontinue the practice of flogging sailors. I did not doubt then, and I do not doubt now, that some regulations are necessary in order to keep up proper and suitable discipline. I have been encouraged by the hope that something might grow out of some considerations like those which have been thrown out by the Senator from New Hampshire; that moral considerations to some extent, and that suitable rewards and suitable encouragements might be held out to men to maintain good character and good discipline on board ships. I am by no means certain that they would not be very greatly encouraged—and that it might not be done with great advantage—by rewarding men, in money if you please, for a course of good conduct long continued—by rewarding them in one of those various ways which are consistent with the discipline and best interests of the service. I rise at the present time mainly to express the hope that when this subject shall be under the consideration of gentlemen composing the Naval Committee, to whom it is referred, they will embrace in their examinations these considerations; that they will bring their minds to bear upon them, and that they will investigate the subject sufficiently to ascertain whether some such course of discipline as that may not be effectual in the Navy.

There are in this bill some pretty hard provisions, which are degrading in their character; but still; as there must be discipline in the Navy, and as men of large experience say that something of this sort is necessary, I shall reluctantly vote for this bill, but with the hope that a milder and more humane system may be introduced.

I think there is a great deal of misapprehension on this subject. It is nearly two years since we passed the act abolishing flogging in the Navy, and also in the civil marine. I live in a commercial community—in a State perhaps as largely engaged in navigation, in proportion to its population and various interests, as any State in the Union; and, as far as regards the mercantile marine, I have never heard a voice raised against it. I never have heard a word of complaint in the mercantile service in regard to it. I have yet to meet the individual who seeks for the restoration of flogging in that service. Now it seems to me that this is a fact that every gentleman can appreciate—that every gentleman can understand. It seems to me that the plain and obvious inference from it is, that the evil of a want of discipline for the want of power to control men by forcible means, is not so great as many gentlemen apprehend. But if gentlemen of experience in the public service still say that some power of this sort is indispensable to preserve good order and good discipline, I shall yield my views to them. I shall vote for this bill, and vote for it with the hope and expectation that the time is not remote when we shall come to a milder system.

Mr. CHASE. I regret the necessity I have felt myself under of saying a word in reference to this bill. I desired, indeed, nothing more than simply to place my name on record against a measure for which I cannot, in conscience, vote. The bill, as originally reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, seems to me liable to comparatively little objection. It institutes, however, a code for the government of the Navy which, in my judgment—inadequate, of course, for it is only that of a landsman—is sufficiently severe.

But I would consent, in deference to the judgment of the committee, and in deference to the judgment of others fully acquainted with the subject, to vote for the bill, with the single amendment of striking out the degrading punishment of "the ball and chain." It will be observed that this punishment is not to be inflicted at sea, but in port, where it is most conspicuous and most degrading.

The amendments which have been offered to this bill, and adopted by the Senate, are, in my judgment, anything but amendments. They are the reverse of amendments. They make that which was harsh and severe enough much more harsh and much more severe. One of these amendments authorizes the commander of any vessel in the Navy, or of any shore station, to punish offences without a court-martial, without investigation, but summarily, and upon his own motion; by diminishing the rations; by restricting the diet to bread and water; by imposing extra police, and other duties; and in case of theft, in addition to any one of these punishments, by making good from the wages of the offender to the owner the value of the article or articles stolen, and obliging the offender to wear for any time not exceeding ten days, a badge with the word "thief" thereon.

Passing over other punishments, I desire to direct the attention of the Senate especially to two. The first of these is the imposition of "extra police and other duties." How large a variety of punishments may be inflicted under this single provision, and how enlarged is the range of discretion which it confers upon the officer in command! It seems to me that it must strike any man who will reflect for a single moment, that it is a power too extensive, too arbitrary, and too dangerous to be granted. The other of these punishments to which I desire to call attention, is that of obliging the offender to wear a badge with the word "thief" thereon. The object of all punishment is reformation; at least the object of all punishment should be reformation; and it seems to me that to the other various punishments authorized by this act and this amendment, it is worse than superfluous to add a punishment which, in its nature, is so degrading and so dishonorable. Sir, a man may be attacked and degraded not by punishment inflicted on the body only, but on the spirit also; and in my judgment, the former is less humiliating than the latter. I cannot, therefore, concur by my vote in the adoption of a law which authorizes a punishment of this character.

And I would say to gentlemen who have professed themselves to be anxious for reformation in the Navy, that it is now, when a bill of this sort, containing provisions which many Senators deem essential to the discipline of the Navy, is under consideration, that they ought to propose the reforms they desire. They should not strengthen the hands of those who are in haste to inflict punishment, but slow to bring relief; who are ready to sanction all that is harsh, invidious, and dishonorable to the sailor, consoling him with the empty promise that at some future time, at some more convenient season, when the isommittee on Naval Affairs shall be quite at leisure to attend to it, some salutary provision will be introduced which may possibly benefit the Condition. I should not have troubled the Senates with the remarks but for the necessity imposed on me by the refusal of the yeas and nays.

Mr. BADGER. I do not wish to go into any discussion upon this bill, for I am anxious that it should be passed as early as possible. I merely wish to make this remark—that as a man consists but of body and of spirit, if we are not at liberty to punish him through his body, it seems to me to be highly wrong to say that we should not punish him by assailing him in his spirit. I think, therefore, that there is nothing in the objection made by the honorable Senator from Ohio.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

KENTUCKY DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the special order is called, I ask the unanimous indulgence of the Senate to introduce a little bill which is a matter of great consequence to the trustees of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in Kentucky. I wish to have this bill before the committee as soon as possible. It is a bill to extend the time for selling the lands granted to the Kentucky Asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb.

Leave being granted, the bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FISH. There is a small bill on the Calendar which I ask the indulgence of the Senate to have passed at this time.

The PRESIDENT. The hour for the consideration of the special order has arrived, and the Chair really cannot allow gentlemen to interpose other business—at least, not without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. FISH. This bill will not occupy more than five minutes, and it is a matter of importance in relation to the courts about to be held this month in the State of New York. It is Senate bill No. 78; a bill amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States, in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," approved July 29, 1850.

Mr. BUTLER. If that bill is to pass at all, it is very important that it should pass now. I am sure there will be no objection to it. In order to bring the subject to which it relates to the understanding of the Senate, I will say that it is to amend a bill which is now in operation, and which thus far has worked well. From what I have learned of this matter, it appears that Judge Betts, of New York, had more business than he could attend to; and by an application of the bar, and with a view of facilitating the business, an act was passed providing that in case of the sickness or other disability of the judge, other judges should be allowed to take his place. This bill is only to extend the provisions of that act, and to allow the judges of the district courts of the State of New York to call in the aid of other judges. There are the judges of the district courts of the States of Vermont and New Hampshire, and some others, who have but very little to do, and might, when requisite, go to New York and do this business very well.

The question was then taken to postpone the prior order, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The bill was then considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the authority conferred by the former act (July 29, 1850) may be exercised by a circuit judge, or by the Chief Justice of the United States, as, in the said act directed, whenever, on the certificate of the clerk of the circuit or district court, under the seal of the court, it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of such judge or chief justice, that the public interest, from the accumulation or urgency of judicial business in any district, shall require it to be done; and that the district judge so designated shall have and exercise the same powers within such district as if the district judge resident therein, were prevented, by sickness or other disability from performing his judicial duties; and that it shall be lawful in case of such appointment, for each of the said district judges separately to hold a district or circuit court at the same time in such district, and discharge all the judicial duties of a district judge therein.

No amendment being offered to the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE COMPROMISE RESOLUTION.

The special order having been called, namely, the resolution offered by Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, in relation to the compromise measures,

Mr. GWIN. I believe, Mr. President, that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] is willing that the special order should be postponed to some future day, as there is a number of important bills which it is desirable should be proceeded with, in order that they may go to the House of Representatives if they are passed here.

Mr. BADGER. Immediately after I had moved an adjournment yesterday, several Senators intimated to me that they had bills here which they were anxious should be proceeded with and sent to the other House; and they desired that I would postpone my remarks on this special order to some future day. I replied that it was of no consequence whether I spoke to-day or at some future time; and I will therefore move the postponement of this subject until this day week.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the bill to change the times for holding the district courts of the United States in the western district of Virginia will be taken up. It is like the other bill which we have just passed. It is simply to change the times of holding the courts, and it is important that it should be acted upon now.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill embraces four sections, the first of which provides that instead of the terms now prescribed by law for holding the district courts of the United States in the western district of Virginia, they shall hereafter commence and be held as follows: At Wytheville on the 28th days of March and August; at Charlestown on the 8th days of April and September; at Wheeling on the 19th days of April and September; at Clarksburg on the 1st days of May and October, and at Stanton on the 20th days of June and November, in every year. Should any of these days fall on Sunday, the court is to be held on the next succeeding Monday.

The second section provides that all proceedings whatever pending, or which may be pending in said courts, shall have a day thereon, and be proceeded with and decided as if the terms of holding said sessions had not been altered.

The third section fixes the salary of the judges at $2,500 per annum, payable as the salaries of other judges of the United States are now paid; and

The fourth section provides that the act shall commence and be in force from and after the first of June next.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NAVIGATION OF THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

The PRESIDENT. The next special order is a bill for improving the navigation of the Upper Mississippi.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I hope the Senate will pass that over, and take up the bill which was under discussion the other day making a grant of land to the State of Iowa for the construction of certain railroads.

Mr. GWIN. Move to postpone all the special orders and take up the Calendar.

Mr. JONES. Very well. I will move to postpone all the special orders and proceed with the Calendar.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone all the special orders, and it was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of "A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State."

The pending question is on the amendment submitted some days since by Mr. UNDERWOOD, which was offered after the bill had been considered as in Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate.

Mr. FELCH proceeded to address the Senate; and having spoken until the usual hour of adjournment without finishing, he yielded the floor at the request of several Senators. The report of his remarks will be found in the Appendix.

NON-INTERVENTION.

Mr. CASS. To-morrow was fixed for the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE.] I had an interview with him last evening, and I do not know whether he will be able to come to the Senate to-morrow. If he is not able to go on, with his concurrence, which I have already obtained, I shall ask the Senate to take up the subject, as soon as my colleague shall have concluded.

CENSUS PRINTING.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the amendment submitted by him to the joint resolution to provide for the printing of the Returns of the Seventh Census, be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

A bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson;
A bill for the relief of John T. Sullivan;
A bill for the relief of Joseph Gideon;
A bill for the relief of John O. Means;
A bill concerning the sessions of the courts of the United States in the district of Delaware;
A bill for the relief of George Poindexter;
A bill for the relief of William Miller;
A bill for the relief of Ezra Williams; and
A bill making an appropriation in part for the erection of a light-house on Sand Key, Florida.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 3, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Monday was read and approved.

INTERVENTION.

Mr. ANDREWS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, in relation to Hungary and intervention.

No objection was made, and they were introduced, as follows:

Resolved extending an invitation to Louis Kossuth.

Resolved, That in Louis Kossuth we recognize a distinguished representative of freedom and constitutional liberty; and that His Excellency the Governor be requested to extend to him a cordial invitation to visit the capital of this State.

Resolved, That we tender to Louis Kossuth the assurance that we entertain a sincere sympathy for the wrongs of Hungary, and a deep detestation of the despotic tyranny of Austria, and the unwarrantable intervention of Russia.

Resolved, That we earnestly desire that the General Government of the United States may exert an influence, in some wise and proper manner, against all such intervention in future.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. ANDREWS. I desire their reference to the same committee to which the resolutions of the State of Alabama upon the same subject were referred.

The SPEAKER. That was the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ANDREWS. I then move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that they be printed; which motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. PEASLEE, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for the purpose of reference in the Senate, the petition and papers of Jacob Gideon.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, presented a certain memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution which I deem of considerable importance.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an additional number of military posts on the overland route from the Missouri river to California, for the protection of emigrants and travelers, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected to its introduction.

ASSIGNABILITY OF BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the special order; which motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORDS in the chair.)

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved to take up the bills made the special order.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion for that purpose is unnecessary. They come up as the first business in order before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The special order is the consideration of the joint resolution of the House, No. 1, and the Senate bill No. 146, explanatory of the act of September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States." The Senate bill having been made a part of the special order, will, in the opinion of the Chair, take precedence.

Mr. FULLER. I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk then read the Senate bill through.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to claim the attention of the House a short time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman to allow me to inquire of the Chair, which bill is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate bill. They are both named in the same order.

Mr. JONES. I believe the rule is to read the first section now, and then it will be open for amendment, and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] will be in order to address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of the bill will be again read.

The first section was then read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all warrants for military bounty land, which have been or may hereafter be issued under any law of the United States, and all valid locations of the same, which have been, or may hereafter be made, are hereby declared to be assignable, by deed or instrument of writing, made and executed after the taking effect of this act, according to such form and pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owners of the warrant or location: Provided, That any person entitled to pre-emption right to any land, shall be entitled to use any such land warrant in payment of the same, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, for the quantity of land therein specified.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Florida will allow me, I desire to inquire whether it would be in order to move an amendment to the Senate bill, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the bill reported by the select committee of the House. My object is to get both propositions before the committee at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose it will not be in order under the rules.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Chair decide that such an amendment is not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not in order to substitute one bill for another when both bills are pending before the committee. It is not in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the House bill. Does the gentleman from Tennessee appeal?

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to get both propositions before the House at the same time. And as the Chair has ruled my motion out of order, I think I will take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is this: The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, and to insert the bill reported to the House from the select committee. The Chair decides, that as both bills are pending before the committee it is not in order to strike out one and insert the other. From that decision the gentleman from Tennessee takes an appeal. The question is, then, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. JENKINS. Is it not better to proceed and perfect the bill before the committee? and then, if it be desired, the gentleman can offer a substitute for it. Will not the gentleman derive all the benefit which he desires by offering his substitute after the bill before the House has been discussed and perfected?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the 55th rule.

The 55th rule was then read, as follows:

"No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration, shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suppose the ground upon which the gentleman from Tennessee rests his motion, is that the House bill and the Senate bill, as now before this committee, are the same in subject matter. They were both taken up by joint motion in the House to refer to this committee. Hence it does not come under the operation of the rule which has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes, however, that two distinct bills cannot be under consideration at the same time, although referred in the same order.

Mr. STEPHENS. The point of order will be, whether this committee can take charge of both of these propositions? It was only by the unanimous consent of the House the other day, that an order of the House was made by which both of these bills were entertained under one motion, and referred to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is usual in such reference to say, that they shall be jointly considered. This order does not so specify.

Mr. FICKLIN. It seems to me, that there is another reason why the decision of the Chair is right, and it is this—

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. FOWLER moved to lay the appeal upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be done in Committee of the Whole.

The question was then taken upon the appeal, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. When the House was last in Committee of the Whole, we were entertained by a discussion between gentlemen from the Northern or Eastern sections of the Union, with some account of the action of parties in their region of the country. I ask the attention of the House now for a very few moments, while I speak of what has been done in another section of the country, which I deem to be of as much public interest as anything, perhaps, to which I can address myself.

Mr. JENKINS. Is it in order to discuss this bill without any amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. CABELL. It will be recollected by the House, that during the progress of our organization, I amongst others expressed my surprise in regard to the action of the two parties, in preparing themselves for that organization, in their respective caucuses. I stated then, and I state now, that when I came to Washington, this winter, it was my expectation, from the opinions which had been so frequently expressed, the declarations so frequently made, and the pledges so frequently given, that the Democratic party of the North and the Union, when brought together here would adopt and recommend to the country an acquiescence in the compromise measures; and that the Whig party could not do so. I have always believed, that upon all general questions, dividing the two parties of the country, the Whig party has been the true conservative party, saving and excepting upon this question of slavery; and upon that they have run as wild as wild can be. I had observed, as I stated upon that occasion, that the Democratic party had been represented by more men upon the floor of the House of Representatives entertaining what I conceive to be sound and proper views of slavery and Southern rights than the Whig party. The mass of these two parties at the North I had never believed to be materially different. I believe the truth is, that they are about the same. But from some cause or other, the Democratic party has heretofore returned more men to the Congress of the United States who entertain views coincident with my own, upon this Southern question, than the Whig party. With these opinions, facts, and expectations, I avowed my purpose in the organization of the House, to act with that party which would stand by the Constitution of the United States and the rights of my section of country, and indorse the compromise resolutions. I thought the Democratic party would do this, but they did not.

My friend from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] during that discussion, suggested to me that I should avail myself of that occasion, or of some early occasion, to separate myself from the Whig party, and come over to the ranks of the Democratic party. Sir, the only alternative upon which I would ever be willing to pursue such a course—the only thing that would ever induce me to think of acting with the Democratic party—the only consideration for it, failed. I had been deceived by the representations of that party. I believed they had put themselves upon constitutional grounds, and I said that I would act with them, as I would act with any party that would pursue that course. But the very first action of that party in the opening of this Congress, was such as to violate that very principle upon which alone I was prepared to act with them. Finding myself then in the unfortunate position of not being able to act with anything like cordiality with the great mass of the Whig party of the North, and not at all with a large portion of them, and failing, as the House will perceive, to find in the Democratic party the adoption of measures that would enable me to act with them, I thought there was yet one party in the country which we might trust. There has of late been established in the southern country what is called the Constitutional Union party—a party formed upon the very principles which I stated would have induced me to act with the Democratic party in the organization of the House, if the Whigs had refused to put themselves on the same platform.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to an article which appeared some time since in one of the leading Union newspapers in Georgia, the Macon Journal and Messenger, and also, to the succeeding action of the Union party in the Legislature of Georgia. Here is a long article which sets out with the proposition, that the time has arrived when the Union party of the South is to determine upon its action in reference to the presidential election. It goes on, then, to state that, in the estimation of the editor of that paper, the Union party cannot act with the Whig party, because they are swallowed up by the Abolitionists, but that they may act with the Democratic party. After taking this position, the article goes on to say:

"We say, then, that the Union men of the South ought to send delegates to the Baltimore Convention. It is the most effectual way to accomplish their design of saving and perpetuating the Union. Unless they do so, that Convention may lose its conservative character, and may bring forward a candidate who will be obnoxious to the South."

"There is at this moment a most singular coalition formed between the Abolitionists and Disunionists to control that Convention. No sensible man can close his eyes to that fact. Van Buren, Blair, Benton, and their Free-Soil coadjutors, are marshalling their forces at the North. Rhet, Commander, McDonald, and Quinman, are gathering together the scattered members of the coffin regiments at the South. These men, defeated in their late treasonable schemes, are now about to combine for the purpose of subsidizing and controlling the national Democracy. They will accomplish their purpose, too—unless defeated by a prompt movement on the part of the Union men of the South. Here, in our very midst, they are changing their names, repudiating their principles, and preparing to associate with what, a few months since, they termed 'the radical, rotten Democracy of the North.' Open Disunionists, who denounced Yankees, who refused to trade with them, or to admit them into their family circles, are now ready to embrace the 'sweet little fellow' of Kinderhook and the whole horde of his Abolition followers. Even the honorable Representative from the first district is found closeted with such men as Disney, of Ohio! Verily, coming events cast their shadows before."

"Now, we hope that the Union men of the South will send delegates to Baltimore for the purpose of breaking up this infamous coalition between the Abolitionists and fire-eaters—we hope they will send delegates there who will cooperate with the true Jackson Democracy—reaffirm the doctrines of the Georgia Convention—ingrain the principles of the compromise upon the Baltimore platform, and bring out some such man as Mr. Buchanan for the Presidency."

"For ourselves, we honestly believe that this is the only way in which the country can be saved. If the Southern Union men remain out of that Convention, the compromise wings of the Democratic party—the true Jackson Democracy—will be overwhelmed by the combined power of the Van Burenites and Rhetites—a Free-Soil Anti-compromise ticket will be nominated—the slavery agitation will be reopened, and the Union will be lost."

"We throw out these hints for the reflection of our Union friends in the Legislature, and hope they will take some action in the premises before they disperse."

"Our Union friends in the Legislature" took the "hint," and passed resolutions recommending the Union party to send delegates to the "Baltimore Convention."

I will not detain the committee by reading the article any further.

Now, sir, if this paper speaks the sentiments of the Constitutional Union party of Georgia, I am to understand that that organization was perfected, not, as has been alleged, for the sake of the Union and the Constitution, but for the sake of the Democratic party. I was elected to this House as a Whig, not as a Constitutional Union man; but I was one of those who were disposed to favor that "organization." But in doing so, let me tell my honorable friends, the members of the Union party, that it was no purpose of mine that they should thereby convert me into a Democrat—and that seems to be their purpose, if this paper speaks the sentiments of the party, and the action of the Union men of the Legislature seems to justify the opinion that it does. Sir, I feel proud of the position that the party with which I have acted here-fore has occupied before the country. I am a member of the Southern Whig party. I believe it to be the constitutional party—the true conservative party of the country, opposed to all mere abstractions of the South, and to Sewardism, Greelyism, Van Burenism, and all the other isms of the North. I feel proud of belonging to that party, because, with few exceptions, the members of it are Union men, and as Union men we might, without surrendering any of our principles, act in harmony with the Union Constitutional party. It would be in accordance with the conservative principles of our party to abandon party names and party organizations to act with any man or set of men who, under a new organization, would contribute to the preservation of the Constitution and the Union. I was willing to go into such an organization, or to act with any party that would faithfully carry out its principles.

But I ask the attention of the House to the reasons which induced this editor to recommend that the Union party should send delegates to the Baltimore Convention. He says:

"The Union men of the South, in our opinion, can accomplish their purposes and establish their principles as effectually without a national Union organization as with it. They now control the States of Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, and Maryland. It is possible they might rally a majority even in South Carolina. The votes of those States are not sufficient to elect a President; but if thrown in one body into a national convention, they might secure the selection of a proper candidate whose election they would place beyond a doubt."

Now, I ask my Union friends why, with that declaration, they should determine to send delegates to the Democratic Convention, rather than to the Whig Convention? I believe they could control either, but I do not think they should be represented in either. I think I may pledge myself for the Whig party, that if the Union party should act cordially with them and go into the Whig Convention, the Whig representatives would do precisely the same as this editor says the Democratic party would do, and which they will not do, unless you go there to help to prevent them from disregarding the Constitution. I believe, from the indications which have lately been made, that the Whig party of the country may—and I hope it will be so, even without the aid of the Union party—put itself upon this constitutional ground and adopt the recommendation of the President of the United States, that the slavery agitation shall cease, and that the compromise of the last Congress shall be considered as final. I hope I may not be mistaken.

Until recently, as I have said, we had more sound men in the councils of our country from among the Democrats than from among the Whigs; and it may be true, as has been alleged, that there was more soundness upon this question in the Democratic party of the North than in the Whig party. But I believe that that state of things does not now exist. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANTOUL] gave the House the reason the other day. They found it was a losing game. The Democratic party of Massachusetts, the gentleman told the House, has been laboring against heavy odds; all the wealth and the power and patronage of the State was against them; the Free-Soil influence was against them; and they were kept down. Well, they had no idea of submitting to that state of things any longer, so they turned round and bargained for, and bought up the Free-Soilers.

Mr. RANTOUL, (interrupting.) With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to say a word or two. Of course, if the gentleman quotes me at all, he intends to quote me correctly. I have not said that the Democratic party had turned round, or had bargained with anybody, or had done anything new to get themselves out of the position which they had been in for the last twenty years. I have described their position, and the Democratic party has still struggled under the same disadvantages. The course it has taken upon the point which the gentleman has been touching on, I intend to explain to the House at a convenient opportunity.

Mr. CABELL. I ask the gentleman whether he considers himself a Democrat?

Mr. RANTOUL. I am very happy the gentleman has put that question. I will answer it if he will allow me to do so. I answer it in this way—and perhaps there is no member upon this floor who can give the answer in a more decided manner than I can: I have been nominated by the Democratic party over and over again for some years past, unanimously; the last nomination I received from that party was a unanimous nomination; it was given to me by the Democratic party, knowing my views upon the question to which the gentleman alludes, and after I had explained those views fully; in a speech since published, at the largest Democratic convention—called without reference to this question—ever held in the district. After that nomination, the trial came on; there was no choice at the first trial. At the second trial after that convention, I received the largest Democratic vote ever thrown in the district; after rejecting the votes of all those Free-Soilers who did me the honor to vote for me, it was still the largest ever thrown at that season of the year. That, I suppose, entitles me to consider myself in full communion with the Democratic party of the State of Massachusetts. If I am not a Democrat, there are no Democrats in New England. That is the necessary and the only inference.

Mr. CABELL. I do not desire a better illustration of the truth of what I have just said, that there is now going on a change in the public mind, as was once said by a distinguished gentleman in the Senate in regard to this question of slavery. We all know what are the opinions of the gentleman who has just spoken, and he tells the House that he received the largest Democratic vote ever given in his district. That is evidence of what is well known to be the fact, that in the State of Massachusetts the Democratic party, tired of being without office, as the gentleman told us the other day, were determined to hold out inducements to these Abolitionists to sustain them. They met in joint convention, nominated some Democrats and some Free-Soilers, elected their men, and ousted the Whigs; and the gentleman, entertaining the opinions which we all know he does, has been sent here by the largest Democratic majority ever given in his district.

Mr. DISNEY, (interrupting.) I was busily engaged in writing, and did not hear the gentleman, but I have been informed that near the commencement of his remarks, he took occasion to introduce my name as having been published in conjunction with the names of certain Abolitionists.

Mr. CABELL. I read it from a newspaper. I will send the paper to the gentleman, and he can read it for himself.

Mr. DISNEY. I have since, with the permission of the gentleman, had an opportunity to look at the paper, and the remark there made legitimately carries with it the inference that I am part and parcel of the Abolition party, or in some degree affiliated with them. Now I avail myself of this occasion to say that I never did in my life, either at home or elsewhere, sympathize in the slightest degree with the Abolition party. I never uttered a sentiment in relation to that party, either on the stump or in the Legislature of my State, but to denounce them. If the statement in that paper is a fair specimen of the intelligence of the people of that country, I do not wonder at any doctrine which the Whig party may adopt there.

Mr. CABELL. I presume the reason why the inference was drawn of which the gentleman from Ohio complains, is, that he expressed or intimated a willingness to vote for the Wilmot proviso for reasons stated at a former Congress, and that he voted against the fugitive slave bill in the last Congress.

Mr. DISNEY. And why did I vote against it?

Mr. CABELL. I do not know why.

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will tell him why.

Mr. CABELL. I cannot be interrupted in this manner. I was proceeding to say—

Mr. DISNEY. I beg just to say that I voted against the fugitive slave law because it was not stringent enough, and because I believed, if passed, it would become a weapon in the hands of the Free-Soilers [laughter] for agitation.

Mr. CABELL. Then it seems the gentleman is more Southern than the South itself; and it seems very singular to me, that if he really entertains these sentiments he should have voted for the Wilmot proviso, and against a bill with which the Southern representatives were satisfied.

Mr. Chairman, there are a good many references which I desire to make to the action of parties in other States, but I cannot for want of time. I will proceed. The coalition in Massachusetts is too palpable, and the position of the Democratic party too well established, to say more in reference to them. We all know what is the position of the Democratic party in the State of Ohio now, and what it has been for some time past. We know the principle upon which the present Governor was recently elected, although he has, in his last message, proclaimed sentiments which meet my approbation, so far as they go. But the Governor of Ohio was elected upon his declaration that "the fugitive slave law can never receive the voluntary cooperation of the people of the State of Ohio." That was the principle upon which he effected his election—opposition to the fugitive slave law. Now, I allude to this fact because a gentleman now occupying the chair, [Mr. OLDS,] in a recent speech, spoke of the peculiar Southernism of the Democracy of Ohio, as shown in this election and in other instances. Again, sir, the late Democratic Convention of Ohio passed a resolution declaring "that slavery is an evil which ought to be eradicated, and its extension prevented by all lawful means." We know that in that convention, held in the State of Ohio, this sentiment was avowed; and such has been the inroad of Free-Soilism upon the Democracy of that State that in a district lately represented by a distinguished member from Ohio, [Mr. Root,] a free soil Whig, whose anti-slavery opinions are well known, is now represented by a free soil Democrat, though, as I am informed, there was a decided Whig majority in the district. The coalition by which Mr. Chase was elected to the Senate is a matter of history. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, the Democrats have fairly outbid the Whigs in this State, as in Massachusetts; and as I heard an Ohio Whig complaining, "the Democrats have bought up or stolen most of our Whig free-soilers." Well, sir, I am glad of it. I rejoice that the Whigs are getting rid of them, and I hope the Democracy will make better use of them than the Whigs did.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to correct him. I know he intends to state his positions correctly. But I will state to him, that in some portions of the State to which he has made allusion, the Democrats have bought up the Whigs. If he will examine the recent political history of that State, he will see that in one portion of the State the whole Whig party were found voting for a Democrat and the Democratic ticket, and that ticket was elected. And that district, which was formerly a strong Whig district, is now one of the strongest Democratic districts in the State. So it seems that the Democrats have bought both the Whigs and Democrats, [renewed laughter.]

Mr. CABELL. This only confirms what I have said. I have not time to allude to coalitions in other States, with which we are all familiar. Now to return to this Constitutional Union party, or rather, I should say, the Constitutional Union Democratic party. I ask the gentlemen of that party why it is they come forward now and seek to force a union with the old Democratic party? What is the position of the great mass of the Democratic party at the South upon the questions upon which the Union party was formed? Their position is directly at war with the principles of the Constitutional Union party. The position of the Whig party of the South cannot be mistaken. It has been clearly defined by their declaration of sentiments, given here and elsewhere, by the votes which have been given by those gentlemen on all occasions upon this floor. They have almost uniformly declared for the Union and the compromise. In this connection I beg to call the attention of the committee to a certain paper which was signed by a good many members of the House of Representatives and a few of the Senate, during the last Congress of the United States. That paper shows the opinion of the two parties in relation to those questions upon which the Union party was formed:

The undersigned, members of the Thirty-first Congress of the United States, believing that a renewal of sectional controversy upon the subject of slavery would be both dangerous to the Union and destructive of its object, and seeing no mode by which such controversy can be avoided, except by a strict adherence to the settlement thereof effected by the compromise acts passed last session of Congress, do hereby declare their intention to maintain the same settlement inviolate, and to resist all attempts to repeal or alter the acts aforesaid, unless by the general consent of the friends of the measures, and to remedy such evils, if any, as time and experience may develop; and for the purpose of making this resolution effective, they further declare that they will not support for the office of President, or of Vice President, or of Senator, or of Representatives in Congress, or as member of a State Legislature, any man, of whatever party, who is not known to be opposed to the disturbance of the settlement aforesaid, and to the renewal in any form of agitation upon the subject of slavery.

This paper is, in substance, a pledge to stand by the principles laid down by the Constitutional Union party, and by the measures known as the compromise measures. The pledge was circulated in the last session, and has appended to it, I believe, the name of every Southern Whig in this House except the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] and his colleague, [Mr. STANLEY.] But there was not a single Democratic member who was willing to put his name upon that paper, except the distinguished gentleman now Governor of Georgia, and late Speaker of this House; and in the Senate, but four gentlemen signed it.

In this connection, let me say to my Union friends, how different has been the course of the Southern Whigs upon the subject heretofore, and how different is the course which they have laid out for themselves for the future. The Whigs of Georgia gave their cordial support to Hon. Howell Cobb, and I rejoice that they did so. We—and I say we, because I am a member of the Southern Whig party, and as such interested in this matter—have pledged ourselves to carry out the resolutions of your Union Convention. Yet you will not act with us—you will not vote for a Whig though he should put himself upon the records as a Union man; but you wish to carry us along, Whig and Democrat, into a Democratic convention—composed in part of those who have expressed their opinions upon this subject adverse to your own, and who are closely allied to those who have been making war upon our institutions at the South.

Another reason why, it seemed to me, the Union party, if they expressed any preference, should not have expressed it so decidedly in favor of the Democratic party, is, that in the organization of this House at the commencement of the present session, the Whig party met in caucus and passed a resolution by which they pledged themselves to sustain the compromise measures of the last Congress, and by which they declared that those measures were the best which could have been adopted under the circumstances. That resolution is in these words:

"Resolved, That we regard the series of acts known as the Adjustment measures as forming in their mutual dependence and connection a system of compromise the most conciliatory, and the best for the entire country that could be obtained from conflicting sectional interests and opinions; and that, therefore, they ought to be adhered to and carried into faithful execution, as a final settlement in principle and substance of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace."—Resolution of Whig Congressional Caucus, December 1, 1851.

This, sir, is the very principle on which the Union party was formed. The Democratic caucus refused to adopt any such resolution. Now, gentlemen of the Union party, in the name of common sense, and in the name of fairness and justice, why is it that you should attempt to connect yourselves with the Democratic party, which has refused to adopt your resolutions and sustain your principles, and refuse to unite with those who have adopted those resolutions, and who have pledged themselves to act with you?

The present Whig President, (Mr. FILLMORE,) in his message, has said:

"The series of measures to which I have alluded are regarded by me as a settlement, in principle and substance—a final settlement—of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace."

And the Secretary of State, Mr. Webster, has also said, in his letter to the Union meeting in Westchester:

"The President's message, at the opening of the present session of Congress, expresses fully and plainly his own and the unanimous opinion of all those associated with him in the Executive administration of the Government, in regard to what are called the adjustment or compromise measures of last session."

Now, sir, why, under these circumstances, was it that the Union party determined to select the Democratic party with which to act, and to ask us Whigs to go along with them?

Sir, my opinion is, that a "change is now going on in the public mind" at the North, among the Whig party, favorable to the South, and I have deeply regretted, as a Southern man, to see the disposition manifested by Southern Democrats to sneer at every indication of returning sound sentiment among the Whig men of the North. For my part, sir, I rejoice, and I have ever rejoiced to see any man, Whig or Democrat, at the North, coming back to a sound, constitutional view of the rights of the South. I have expressed by approbation at the views set forth in the last message of the present Democratic Governor of the State of Ohio, although they are entirely at variance with those he expressed before his election. I expressed my gratification at the election of the Democratic Governor of Pennsylvania, though it is known that, as a member of the State Legislature of that State, he voted for the anti-jail law of Pennsylvania. He voted for that law depriving the people of the South of the use of their jails for the purpose of confining their fugitive slaves. But he has changed his opinion, and I give him credit for it. I rejoice at his election, though David Wilmot was run on the ticket with him and elected a Judge by the Democratic party. And why is it that we hear gentlemen sneering and attributing it to the most selfish and unkind motives, when a gentleman of the Whig party of the North shows a disposition to depart from that former unsound position?

How often have we heard the most unkind and disparaging allusions made to the present position of the Secretary of State and the Governor of New York, and of other Northern men who now act so much in opposition to opinions heretofore entertained and expressed.

After the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR,] who I do not now see in his seat, had made the patriotic speech which he did a few days ago, upon this floor, I could not but be surprised at the feeling of gratification which seemed to exhibit itself in the faces of many Southern gentlemen, when his colleague [Mr. OLDS] replied in a tone of invective and sneering, because he had had the manliness to vote for the fugitive slave bill.

Mr. MEADE. I openly expressed my gratification at the stand taken by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] at the time; and it is obvious that every Southern man must have felt gratified by it. I should like the gentleman to point out a Southern man who was not gratified with that position.

Mr. CABELL. The gentleman misunderstands me. I said I was surprised at the gratification with which the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] in reply to the manly and patriotic speech of his colleague, [Mr. TAYLOR,] was received. But, inasmuch as that gentleman is not now in his seat, I shall forbear to make any further allusion to the subject.

Mr. MEADE. That gentleman voted for the fugitive slave law.

Mr. CABELL. That is quite a mistake. The gentleman did not vote for the fugitive slave law. I have shown a sufficient reason why the Union party of the South should not go into convention with the Democratic party.

The paper from which I have read, and which recommends the sending of delegates to Baltimore, gives the most conclusive reason why this should not be done. I refer to that part in which the coalition between the Southern Democrats and the Abolitionists is alluded to. Now, my opinion is that the Union party has nothing to do with either of these conventions. I think they have no right to send delegates to one or the other. But I have shown a reason why, if they send delegates to either of them, there is certainly as much reason for sending them to the Whig as to the Democratic Convention. I have already expressed my surprise at the action of the Union party in the State of Georgia; and I am still more surprised at the action of certain gentlemen who were elected to this House upon the principle of an entire separation from both the great parties of the country. When they arrive at the Congress of the United States we find some of these gentlemen going into the Democratic caucus; affiliating with Disunionists of the South and Abolitionists of the North; and when that caucus rejected their compromise resolution, voting for its nominees.

I am told by some of the gentlemen who occupy this position, that the Whig party, after passing these resolutions, nominated no candidates for the various offices of the House. But, sir, I would be glad to know how it is that gentlemen thus standing and representing the Union party, could bring themselves to act with or on the Democratic Committee of the great National Democratic party in the late meeting held by them in the city of Washington, in connection with the gentlemen who composed that committee? Will it not sound strange to the Union party South to find the names of Mr. Thomas Bartlett, of Vermont, (Free-Soiler,) associated with that of Jos. W. Jackson, (Southern Rights), John G. Freeman, (Union,) and Robert W. Johnson, of Arkansas, (Southern Rights)?

Mr. JACKSON (interrupting) was understood by the Reporter to say that he had been nominated by the regular State-Right Democratic party of his State, and not by the Union party.

Mr. CABELL. As to the gentleman from Georgia, his position is not even doubtful. He is not one of those obscure individuals, whose position is not known to this House as well as to the country. My remarks were addressed to the Union men. I find members elected by the Union organization—

Mr. FREEMAN, (interrupting.) As the gentleman has directed his remarks to the Union Democrats, I have to say to him, I was always a Union Democrat; was nominated by my district because I was a Union Democrat; and I came here to represent that principle and no other, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. CABELL. I understand the position of the gentleman. He was elected as a Union Democrat. He was elected in direct opposition to the position occupied by my friend from Arkansas, his associate on this committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, (interrupting,) made a remark inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Chairman, I will make no allusions to any individual again. [Laughter.] The position of the gentleman from Arkansas is that which is the position of the whole Democratic party.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would not say a word here, were it not a fact, that I was nominated by a Democratic Convention, and as a Democratic candidate, with a full knowledge of all the positions I have taken here.

Mr. CABELL. We all know the position of the gentleman from Arkansas, and he will excuse me—

Mr. JOHNSON, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Florida—

Mr. CABELL. My remarks were not addressed to your section of the Democratic party.

Mr. JOHNSON. You spoke my name.

Mr. CABELL. I retract the name. [Laughter.] I have only to say, that if this is to be the end of this Union organization, then I, as one who, though elected as a Whig, have given all the aid I could to strengthen the organization and to induce the Whigs of my State to abandon their old party organization and unite themselves with this, which purported to be the party of the Constitution. But if a Democratic gentleman, elected by this Union organization, were to come to the Congress of the United States and act with the Democratic party in their primary meeting for calling their convention, and to go into that convention, we in Florida would be very apt to hand him over to the tender mercies of the "fire-enters." I shall not pretend to say what their Whig associates in Georgia and Mississippi should do. I do not know what others may do, but I say, as a member of that party, I would do more to defeat the election of men who occupy that position than I would of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] or my friend from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] or North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] or any of those gentlemen who have been ultra in what they deem a defence of Southern rights. They have deceived no one.

I have thus hastily stated my views in regard to what I believe to be an abandonment of the principle on which the Union party was formed. I trust that the course recommended by the Union men of the Legislature of Georgia will not be adopted by the Union party of that State.

Mr. Chairman, I venture to predict, that when these Union men go to that Baltimore Convention, they will find themselves in the position they were in the organization of this House. Those resolutions will be offered, and they will be voted down, and some man whose opinions are not clearly defined before the country will be nominated, and they will acquiesce. This is my opinion as to what will be the result of this whole thing.

By going into this convention they violate the principles upon which they originally based their organization. They will go further, and do what I have just now stated. They will nominate some such man as William O. Butler, of Kentucky, a man whose opinions are not known, except that he has happened to own some slaves, and who will be sustained by Van Buren & Co., as a Southern man with Northern sentiments, and by the Southern Rights men as one of themselves. I will never give my support to a man whose position is not definitely and clearly known.

A VOICE. You supported such a man in 1848.

Mr. CABELL. Yes. But if I can be forgiven for that, I will never do the like again. I beg my Union friends, and all Southern men, not to commit the same error the Whigs committed during the last presidential election.

I repeat, sir, and I think this should be the position of all men who love this Union, that before any man should be nominated for the Presidency, or sustained by the South, his opinions should be clearly spread upon record. Nothing, I think, could be so unfortunate for the country as a recurrence of the incidents of the last presidential election.

On this point I believe the Southern Whig party is nearly undivided, and the whole country should understand their position. The South should not, and will not, countenance any efforts of this sort to attempt to conciliate the Abolitionists of the North, by concealing the opinions of the candidate they are called upon to support. I wish that position clearly laid down by the members of both parties. But I believe that a scheme is now on foot by the members of the different divisions of the Democratic party, to nominate a man whose position is undefined, and who will enable the party to keep up the slavery agitation. I wish to call the attention of the country to it, in order that the people themselves may speak upon this point. I find the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL,] who has recently addressed the House, and other gentlemen from the North, and gentlemen from the extreme South, expressing their determination to stand by the platform of 1844 and 1848. That, they say, will satisfy them. All these—Abolitionists, Disunionists, and Free-Soilers—are willing to stand upon that old rotten platform of 1848, by which they will be enabled to nominate a man whose opinions have not been expressed, and are not known. They will, at the North, represent him as an Abolitionist and a Free-Soiler, and coming down to the South, represent him as a true bona fide Southern man. We find these gentlemen now acting in concert with the Van Buren and the Benton class. Mr. Benton has recently published a letter in which he expressed the opinion that the Democratic party should go into convention upon the resolutions of 1848, and nothing more, as has been recommended by Southern as well as other Northern gentlemen.

Mr. Benton says, in defining "the Democratic ground in relation to slavery:"

"Adhesion to the Baltimore platform of 1848 is another point on which I hold you to be right, and the Nullifiers wrong. That platform contains the Democratic ground in relation to slavery. The Nullifiers wish to ingratiate upon it a new dogma, which was expressly, and almost unanimously, rejected by the convention which framed it, namely, that Congress has no right to legislate upon slavery in the Territories. This dogma, like all the doctrines of the school to which it belongs, is of modern invention, and only invented for the purpose of multiplying chances to find pretexts to resist the laws of Congress, and for flying off into that new confederacy which is to consist wholly of slave States, and to be christened "The United States South." The Democracy take the Baltimore platform as it was agreed to—not as it was not agreed to—still less as rejected—and above all as attempted to be interpolated by the dogs of the party which made the effort, and so miserably failed in it at Baltimore."

Mr. Benton objects to any addition to that platform of '48, which my Union friends are willing and anxious to adopt, for the reason, he says, that such additions tend to express the opinion "that Congress has no right to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the Territories." He is for the resolutions as they are, though they justify the doctrine of the Wilmot proviso. Here I find men, extreme in their Southern opinions, willing to go into that convention and adopt the resolutions of '48, and willing to stand by them. I ask how can Southern Rights Union men act with such an association as this? And how can constitutional Union men join such an association?

But we are told that we must nominate somebody and vote for somebody. Well, sir, my choice, as an individual member of this House, and as a citizen of the United States, is for the present President of the United States. I have never hesitated to express my opinion, that I am in favor of the election of Millard Fillmore for the President of the United States. I think the country is more indebted to him than to any other man living, for the peace and quiet we enjoy. And I believe there is a moral obligation resting upon the South, especially Southern Whigs, and indeed on all compromise men, to stand by Mr. Fillmore for a reelection to the presidency. We all know the agency he had in quieting the slavery agitation, and we know, too, that without his aid, those measures would not have been passed. I can understand how Southern-Rights men and Disunionists can vote against him. But it seems to me that men who desire the peace and quiet of the country, and are in favor of the compromise measures, as a final settlement of the exciting topics embraced in them, are bound to rally around and support Mr. Fillmore, for no man has done so much to preserve the peace and harmony of the country, and to preserve the union of these States. In sustaining him they sustain a great principle.

Now, I understand that Mr. Fillmore is not to be a candidate for the Presidency. I do not know how that is. I need not say that I shall deeply regret his withdrawal, and I am sure I speak the sentiments of nineteen twentieths of the Whigs of the Southern States when I say he, of all men, is the man they desire to see elected to the next Presidency. If Mr. Fillmore is compelled to withdraw because he cannot receive the votes of Northern Whigs, I cannot but regard it as an evidence that that portion of my party has resolved not to respect the constitutional rights of my section of the Union. In such a case I shall feel myself all at sea; a regular outsider.

I have shown that, in the present position of affairs, cooperation with the Democratic party is out of the question. The Union party has abandoned the principles on which it was formed, and unless the Northern Whigs change the position they have hitherto occupied, I, as a Southern Whig, never can and never will act with them. It would be with great difficulty that I could ever bring myself to support a candidate for the Presidency who is cordially supported by the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD.]

I hear gentlemen say that the Whig party will probably do what I have said I would condemn in the Democratic party, and that their convention will nominate a man occupying the position of General Butler, and I have been asked what would be my course in such a case? General Scott occupies just the relation to the Whig party that General Butler does to the Democratic party. Would I support him? I answer unhesitatingly, No. I will not support him, but will do all in my power to defeat the election of any man who, in such times as these, withholds his opinions from the public.

Of this distinguished man I will say, that I regard him as the greatest captain of the age, and that I believe no man has ever lived who has achieved so much and been so little rewarded or appreciated. My personal relations with him are such that, individually, his election would be more acceptable to me than that of any other man in this country; but, sir, in his present position, I cannot and will not give him my vote for the Presidency; and in speaking thus, I think I express the sentiment of the Southern Whig party. Unless he will do what the country have a right to demand of him—spread his opinions upon the record, in characters so plain that he who runs may read—he cannot be supported by them. General Scott, individually, is entitled to the support of all compromise men. I happen to know during the last Congress, the opinions he entertained on these questions. Whilst acting Secretary of War subsequent to the death of General Taylor, and previous to the formation of Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet, he exerted his personal influence to the utmost to effect the passage of the compromise measures.

But I, and Northern gentlemen who know his opinions upon that subject, should know that the whole Whig party of the South will demand something more clear, determinate. We insist that our candidate shall express his opinions to the country, or that the nominating convention shall take the responsibility of doing so. We do not want a man to stand in the position that in the North the Abolitionists can say he occupies their ground, and in the South that he advocates the Southern principles.

Mr. HIBBARD, (interrupting.) One question as to a matter of fact. I understand the gentleman to say that he is in favor of the reelection of Mr. Fillmore for the Presidency.

Mr. CABELL. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HIBBARD. Only a word.

Mr. CABELL. I cannot. My time is very short. As to General Scott, notwithstanding my high admiration of the man, notwithstanding the friendly relations existing between us, I will not do what I believe the Democratic party will do—take a man without any exposition of his principles. Here let me say, that it is almost, if not entirely, too late for this gallant soldier to do himself justice, to extricate himself from the false position into which the acts of designing men have inveigled him. The American people may say, as did the French to Louis Philippe, it is "too late." He has put it off too long. He has allowed himself to remain too long in a false position, and it may be now too late for him to remedy the error, and consequently the injury he has done himself. I think I can say with confidence, that he, as he now stands, cannot receive the support of a respectable portion of the Southern Whig party. In his present position, if nominated by the Whig party for the Presidency, I do not believe that in my State he would receive fifty votes; and I am quite sure that he would not get the electoral vote of one Southern State. I have been told by some gentleman, that, even in his present position, he would receive the vote of Kentucky if nominated, but I do not believe it. I appeal to the gentlemen from that State to bear me out in the declaration I now make, that no man will receive the Whig vote of that State who does not come out clearly, manfully, and decidedly, and put himself upon the record—who does not define his position in such a manner that there can be no mistaking it. What the Democrats will do I know not. They may go for Butler or some other man candidate. I may make the same declaration of Tennessee.

Mr. POLK. The gentleman need not be uneasy. General Scott never will receive the vote of that State.

Mr. CABELL. I have no uneasiness. I ask gentlemen from Kentucky and Tennessee to correct the statement I have made here, if I am wrong.

I repeat, sir, the Southern Whigs are determined, so far as they are concerned, that no man shall be elected President of the United States whose opinion is capable of misrepresentation. If a man is in favor of the settlement of these questions, in the name of common sense, why does he not come forward before the world, and put himself upon the record and say so? In that way all doubt would be removed. We will hold him liable to the imputation of double-dealing, and of desiring to pander to the fanatical abolition sentiment of the North. Let Northern Whigs clearly understand this fact. I assure them there is no mistake about it.

I regret that the time allotted to me will not permit me to say more on this point. But it is, perhaps, enough to have stated the proposition. I have deemed it due to the people of this country, that the opinions of aspirants for the Presidency should be clearly understood. I have introduced this discussion now, that gentlemen representing the various parties of the country, and the friends of the numerous aspirants to the Presidency here, may enlighten the people on questions of such general and vital interest. Let the people have light, and they will see to it that none but a good man of some party shall be elected President. Should the politicians of neither party have the moral courage, and sense of justice, and propriety to spurn from its bosom the Free-Soil faction, the people will take the matter into their own hands, and a third party, planting and maintaining itself on the Constitution, will be called to preside over the destinies of the Republic. My purpose is to elicit debate; and seeing other gentlemen anxious to address the committee, I yield the floor.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to enter into any political discussion at this time, nor shall I do so to any considerable extent; but I feel it to be due to myself and to the party to which I belong to make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Florida. I differ, I apprehend, in one respect from the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] and that difference is this: He has heretofore, as I understand, been a member of the Whig party, and I have heretofore been a member of the Democratic party. I come here now a member of what is called the "Union Party," and from the gentleman I understand he comes here in the same character. He says that he, however, has never understood until now that that party was formed with the purpose of carrying out the principles of the Democratic party. I, just like the gentleman, have never understood that the party was formed for the particular purpose of carrying out Whig principles. That party is composed of Whigs and Democrats.

The gentleman asked why they are going to the Baltimore Convention? They are going there to see whether the Baltimore Convention will adopt the principles for which they contend, and for which I have always contended; and I have contended that the principles upon which the Union party of Georgia is formed are not repugnant to the principles of the Democratic party. Their determination to sustain and prevent interference with that institution so intimately connected with the South is nothing more nor less than the Democratic party has always determined when they made it a part of their platform. Non-intervention upon the subject of slavery was the doctrine of the American people. When they say now that Congress has no power to legislate upon the subject of slavery, to inhibit it from the Territories belonging to the United States, that they have no power to abolish it where it is, nor carry it where it is not, they sustain the principles upon which the Union party of Georgia is formed, and upon which they now stand. I say, if the Baltimore Convention will do this, they will sustain the position of the Union party of Georgia; and we are willing, so far as the indications go, to unite with that convention for the purpose of trying the experiment. Will the gentleman fall out with us for endeavoring to do that which he wants to do himself? What is the objection to going to Baltimore? If the principle can be carried out there, although not in the words of the Georgia platform—if they recognize the principle, will we not have accomplished the object for which we united, and will we not be consistent with the position we have heretofore occupied? But the gentleman says, why select that convention? Because the action in Georgia tells him. They tell him there that they believe the Democratic party North will be more likely to recognize the principles for which we contend than the Whig. If the gentleman is anxious these principles shall be sustained, why object to their going there to try the experiment? Why not as well go there as to the convention of the other party? I say I am willing to see the principles of the Georgia platform sustained, and have promised to stand by them no matter who may adopt and carry them out.

The gentleman and myself are at issue upon another point. He prefers the man for the Presidency above all others that I do not. That is another difference between the gentleman and myself; and I tell him, if the Union party should think the Whig party would be more likely to sustain and carry out the principles we consider of importance and vital to our very existence, I should not be the first man to rise and say, that I object to going there, when I had not time to see the worst—to know that was not the proper place for carrying out our principles. I say it is right. If we, by going there, can do so, I for one shall be proud that the party did go there, provided they determine to do so.

Mr. CABELL, (interposing.) Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question? The gentleman from Georgia and myself agree as to the object we have in view. I have expressed the opinion, that if the Democratic party nominate a man who will stand in the position I have occupied for the last twelve months, and the Whig party refuse to nominate such a man, I will give my support to the Democratic candidate. Now, I ask the gentleman from Georgia, will he put himself upon that ground? Will he say, if the Democratic party meet in convention, and adopt those unmeaning resolutions—the double-faced resolutions of 1848, nothing more, and the resolutions of 1798, perhaps a little more definite, and refuse to take the position which the Union party of Georgia occupies, while the Whig party should adopt the Georgia platform, in substance, will he vote for the Whig candidate, and against the Democratic candidate?

Mr. POLK. They have other sins to answer for.

Mr. MURPHY. I have just stated, and I repeat it, that we organized upon the principle of the Union party of Georgia, and that that principle is proclaimed to the world. I say now, that I will vote for no man who is opposed to it against a man who is in favor of it.

Mr. CABELL. The gentleman does not answer my question. Will he vote for a man if he is a Whig, who is with him, against a Democrat who is not with him? Will he vote for the Democrat or the Whig? Suppose the Whig Convention should put itself upon the Georgia platform, as I suppose it will, and the Democratic Convention should not, will you, as a Union man, vote for the Whig candidate and against the Democratic candidate?

Mr. MURPHY. I thought I had answered that question distinctly. He asks me now, if I understand him, if the Whig candidate of the convention puts himself in substance upon the Georgia platform, and the Democratic candidate does not, whether I will vote for the Whig candidate or not. I am willing to be catechised upon all political subjects. When I was put in nomination for the seat which I have now the honor to hold, I proclaimed everywhere in the canvass that I was a Democrat; but it was unnecessary to tell them that; everybody knew it. I said then that I acted with the Whigs because I agreed with them upon the issue which was then before the country; and I looked upon it as paramount to all others which had divided us before. I took particular care to say upon all occasions that those who had charged me with turning Whig had misunderstood me; that my political opinions upon all former issues had undergone no change.

Now, I say to the gentleman, if the old Whig doctrines were up, and the Democracy in opposition to them, his candidate was a Whig, and in favor of a United States Bank, of a protective tariff, of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and against the Sub-Treasury; in short, if he was in favor of all the doctrines I had opposed and believed to be wrong, he would have to be more than in substance on the platform before I could vote for him.

Mr. GORMAN. That will answer very well.

Mr. MURPHY. While this question is up, I desire to ask the gentleman a question; and I want an answer. Why does he object to make the experiment at the Baltimore Convention, before he knows whether they will succeed there or not? What is his objection? I ask.

Mr. CABELL. I thought I had answered that question. I understood that the Union party of Georgia was separating itself from all parties; and it was assumed there, that neither of the old parties occupied a position with which the Union party could agree, otherwise there was no necessity for forming this Union party. That was the reason which induced Whigs to go into this new organization, and similar reasons influenced the Democrats who joined it.

There are Whigs in Georgia who occupied the same position that the gentleman does to his party. It would be just as reasonable for these Whigs to ask their Democratic associates to go with them into a Whig Convention and vote for their candidate because of their party affiliations, as for Union Democrats to ask the Whigs to go into the Baltimore Convention. Therefore I say, that you should send delegates to neither convention. I assume it to be the duty of the Union party to have no connection with either of these parties, until they have acted. When they have acted, then you can take a position. Your party was formed upon the principle that you were to separate from both of these parties. The gentleman will bear me out in this: that the object of the Union party was to separate from both of the old parties—form a party upon the principle of this great Union question—the compromise question; and therefore there was an impropriety in asking Whigs who had shown a willingness to separate themselves from their party, to go into a Democratic Convention, because they had concluded both parties were wrong. That is the reason you should not ask Whig men who are as good Union men as Democrats, and Democrats as good Union men, as Whigs to go into convention at Baltimore or Philadelphia.

Mr. MURPHY. I will not detain the House long, but I desire in a few words to give the gentleman the reasons why I am willing to go to the Baltimore Convention, for I confess I am willing to go there, and I am only willing to go there with the party with whom I now act. I believe it is their duty to go there, and I am glad to see they think so, from present indications. I propose now to give the gentleman the reasons why I make this declaration. I am not going into a discussion upon this subject with the Abolitionists at this time. We know there are a great many Abolitionists in both parties, and we know that they contend against the principles upon which we have organized. We know there are others opposed to debating the principles elsewhere. Here I would remark, for fear I may forget it, that I have never said I would not go with either of the old parties. My position during the canvass was, that I would go with the party that would carry out the principles upon which we were organized, and for which I was then contending. Now the reason I am willing to go to Baltimore is this: We know there is an opposition to us there, and we know, too, that we have friends there. We know there are men there who will be with us; and I say if by going there and acting with them, we can counteract the influence of those who are opposed to us, and put the party upon principles that are right and correct, we shall have achieved that which determined the principles of the Union party in Georgia. Is there any objection to taking that course and making that experiment? I hear gentlemen say here, almost all of them, that the compromise is looked upon as a final settlement. They are willing to say it everywhere, except in convention, and I cannot for my life see why any man, who is willing to say it here, should not be willing to say it there. If it is a settlement, why not say so, and act upon it as a settlement, and not keep up the agitation amongst the people upon the subject? I am not saying that I am wedded to the Democratic party. I say this: I say I am wedded to all the principles heretofore contended for by that party. I have acted upon them, and I have said I believed they were right. I did not say it because I was a partisan. I said it because I believed it, and I never expect to place myself in a position where I shall be compelled to condemn that position. I suppose my friend is in the same condition. If I can remain in the Democratic party without a sacrifice of the principles of the Union party, I am willing and anxious to do it without any concealment. I am not willing to go with that party, or any other party, as the gentleman seems to intimate, at the sacrifice of any feelings and principles of the Whig members of the Union party who are now connected with me. But in the Georgia movement, of which the gentleman complains, there were Whigs and Democrats—men upon whose opinions I could rely, and their opinion was, as expressed in the resolution, that our principles will be more likely to be carried out there than they would be with the Whig party. Hence it is that they have determined to make the experiment. If the party take any other course—if I can agree with it when it lays down its position, and I presume I shall, I shall be found sustaining the principles of the party with which I now act. I would not be willing to vote for the great Captain. I differ with the gentleman in that respect. It may be that he has entertained principles different from what I understand he now does upon the subject of slavery, and I therefore make no declaration as to what I may hereafter do. I only intend to say, his great captain would not be my particular choice. I intend to lay down a preference for no particular man. I am willing to vote for the man who places himself upon correct principles, and pledges himself to carry them out. Let that man be whom he may, to that I hold. I could not say that I would vote for this man, because he was called a Democrat, or that man, because he was called a Whig; and my opinion is, that the time for forming a National Union party is past. The indications are now all against it, and I ask, if it be so, whether the Union party of Georgia are to stand still in a position where they can do nothing, rather than act with those with whom they can agree, and where they can do much? I have made these remarks hastily, not intending to say anything upon the subject; but feeling myself called upon, by the remarks made against the action of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and by way of explaining the action of the party who have sent me here, I have submitted these remarks, and will now conclude, thanking the committee for their indulgence.

Mr. McMULLIN. I do not rise for the purpose of making a political speech, as has been done by the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] upon a bill which has for its object the granting of mere authority to the soldier to transfer his land warrant. I think, with due deference to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] after all the long speeches I have heard delivered in the House of Representatives, and elsewhere, that this is the most unpropitious bill upon which to make a political speech.

I have not risen for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from Florida, or of making a political speech; but I desire to call the attention of the committee to the subject-matter now under consideration. What is it? Why, it is a bill which has for its object to permit the soldiers who received bounty land warrants, under the act of the last Congress, to transfer those warrants. I take occasion to say, that there is no subject which has been before this Congress, or which will come before it, in which the poor soldier feels more interest than he does in this little bill. And yet the gentleman from Florida gravely gets up here, and upon this bill, of all others, predicates a political speech, and attempts to read political lectures to the two great political parties of the country, and also, at the same time, alludes to this lately-formed, new-fangled, piebald, third party, composed of factions of all parties, and misnamed "the Union Party."

Mr. DISNEY. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I desire to say a word or two of explanation purely of a personal character, which I should have said when the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] was up had it not been for his obvious impatience to proceed with his remarks. That gentleman took occasion to allude to the fact that I did not vote for the fugitive slave law of the last Congress. I told the gentleman at the time, and I repeat it now, that the reason why I did not vote for that law, was because it was, in my judgment, defective, and would not accomplish the objects for which it was designed, but would be a weapon in the hands of the Free-Soilers. The chairman of the committee who had that bill in charge, called for the previous question upon it. I urged him to withdraw the call, to enable me to offer amendments that would put the bill in a shape that would accomplish, as I thought, the desired object. He refused to do it, and as I did not choose to have the bill crammed down my throat in that defective form, I determined to vote against it, for I apprehended then, what has since proved to be true, that the bill, in its present shape, would be an instrument of agitation in the hands of the Free-Soilers of the North. I make these remarks to set myself right before the country, and right before the members of this House, and the record will bear me out in what I have said.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I desire to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. McMULLIN. Really, I am so good-natured that all my time will be consumed. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not wish to make a speech. I merely wish to inquire of my colleague, whether he is opposed to any modification of the fugitive slave law?

Mr. DISNEY. I will answer that question categorically. I am. And why? Because the people of the country generally having agreed to the settlement of this matter, though I believed it to be defective, I am willing to submit to it. Is my colleague answered?

Mr. POLK. How are you now, Mr. CAMPBELL? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will vote to modify, or repeal the law. Are you answered?

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] allow me to put an interrogatory to him?

Mr. CABELL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] addressed himself to me, and therefore I ask permission to say a word or two.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] allow me to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from Ohio? [Mr. CAMPBELL.]

[Loud cries of "Order!" and great confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. McMULLIN. I cannot yield the floor to so many gentlemen, but I give way to the gentleman from Tennessee to ask his question.

Mr. POLK. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] has asked his colleague, the Representative of the Cincinnati district, [Mr. DISNEY,] if he is opposed to any alteration or modification of the compromise acts of 1850; and that gentleman replies that he will oppose any such modification. I now propound to the gentleman furthest from me [Mr. CAMPBELL] this question: Will you, sir, vote to open up the discussion of the agitating question of slavery? Will you vote to amend, modify, or change any part of the compromise measures?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take great pleasure in answering the question which has been propounded to me. I think I can say with safety that I have taken no steps since the organization of this Congress to agitate again the question of slavery, but—

Mr. POLK. I demand a categorical answer to my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I shall not yield anything to a demand of that sort. I have not said that I am in favor of an agitation of that question here at this particular time. I have not said that I am in favor of agitating it here, because I know enough of this House, from the experience of the last Congress, to be aware of the fact that agitation upon that subject in this House, in these days, is attended with no practical good. Now, as to the other question, the gentleman desires to know whether, if a vote of this House should be taken upon a proposition to modify the fugitive slave law, I would vote to modify it? I answer him, without any equivocation or circumlocution, that I would so vote, because, whilst I admit the full force of the constitutional obligation in relation to fugitives from labor, I believe that the details of the law are unjust and oppressive. I believe that the day will come, and that, too, before long, when the public mind will require a change—when Southern statesmen, whose minds are not so blinded by prejudice as to prevent their distinguishing right from wrong, will themselves rise up here and propose a modification of that law.

Mr. POLK. Now, will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. As many as you please, sir, if it takes up the whole day, provided the gentleman from Virginia will allow me time enough to answer them.

Mr. POLK. I have not the pleasure of sufficient acquaintance with the gentleman to know, and therefore I desire to ask him whether he is a Whig or a Democrat?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I believe there is a difference between Southern Whigs and Northern Whigs, as there certainly is between Southern Democrats and Northern Democrats upon the question of slavery. So far as I am concerned, I think my political opinions have always been perfectly understood in my own State; and I should be better understood were I to inform the gentleman what principles and measures I advocate, but this is no time for that. I have always been regarded there as a Whig. I have always been nominated when a candidate as a Whig. I have always advocated the measures which are called Whig measures in Ohio. I have always voted the Whig ticket throughout my whole life, without a scratch, except in the presidential election of 1848, when, for the first and, as I trust, the last time, I "dodged," and did not vote at all. But, Mr. Chairman, I rose a while ago to propound an interrogatory to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. POLK. Stop, I have not done with you yet.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Nor have I done with you, sir. I desired, as the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] (who is now so strenuously in favor of committals and platforms) will well remember, in the National Convention at Philadelphia, to have the opinions of the candidates spread upon the record. That gentleman will also remember that, notwithstanding almost the entire portion of that Convention from the North desired it, he was one of the chief actors in yelling down those who advocated an unequivocal expression, and, I may say, to some extent in stifling an expression of the true sentiments of that body. I think, therefore, that it comes with a very bad grace from him now to say that he requires the platform to be distinctly laid down.

Mr. CABELL. I have but a single word to say, and that is, that I was not a member of the Philadelphia Convention.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If you were not a regular delegate there you were brought in as an outsider, and I know used all your influence to prevent the passage of any resolutions.

Mr. POLK. The gentleman from Ohio has answered my questions, if I understand him correctly, first, that he would vote to repeal or modify the fugitive slave law.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Understand me, that I admit the full force of the constitutional provision, and would vote for a law on the subject of fugitives from labor; but I am against the unjust details of the present law, and when the time comes for voting I will so record my name.

Mr. POLK. I wish you to be distinct, if you please. I do not wish to misapprehend you, and therefore I ask the question again, provided you will not make a long speech in reply.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman intends to dictate to me the terms or the manner in which I shall answer his question, I will not answer it at all. I understand as well as he does what is due in courtesy from one member to another, and I shall endeavor to maintain my dignity as well as my rights.

Mr. POLK. Unless I have misapprehended the gentleman, he says that he belongs to the Whig party; that he has always been nominated by and voted with the Whig party, and that he stands in his own district in high estimation as a Whig. I now ask him, is it an element in the creed of Whiggery that that fugitive slave law shall be repealed, modified, or amended?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not said whether I stood high or not in my own district. That is for others to speak of, not for me. I do not come here for the purpose of answering for all the Whigs in my State, nor will I answer for all the Whigs in my district, nor for all the Democrats of my district, for I will freely admit there is a diversity of opinion among them. A very few are for the law as it is; but most of them, of both parties, are for a modification or a repeal. I answer now for myself, and myself alone. My opinions, however, are well known and understood in my district and State. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] if I understood him, desired that I should not make a long speech. I do not intend to make one; but I wish it to be distinctly understood, that in no instance, since the opening of this Congress, have I proposed to renew the slavery agitation here, or to reopen the "bleeding wounds." And let it be remembered, that no Northern man has yet introduced the vexed question into our debates. All this agitation comes from the South.

I have only risen for the purpose of answering, as I think I have answered, very directly, the questions propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK.] Whilst I acknowledge the full force of our constitutional duty in regard to fugitives from labor, still I believe the details of that law are iniquitous, oppressive, and unjust. That is my opinion; and whenever I am called on to give my vote, I shall vote in accordance with that opinion: for I know of no principle of moral philosophy by which I could justify myself in voting against a law which is right, or for a law which is wrong. And I believe that a majority of the people of Ohio, of all parties, take a similar position.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have no doubt, that if I have done nothing else, I am entitled to the grateful acknowledgments of the gentlemen who have availed themselves of my courtesy to make general speeches out of my time.

Now, I must be permitted to express my surprise, as I also do my regret at the course of remarks submitted by the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL.] That gentleman informed this House, that he had taken an oath of allegiance by subscribing his name to that memorable pledge gotten up by the members of the Thirty-first Congress. My friend on my right says a second declaration of independence. The gentleman from Florida seems to pride himself upon the fact, that he was one of the signers of the second declaration of independence. But that gentleman went further. He said that there was not a single Southern Democratic member of the House, who signed that paper, except the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Cobb, now the Chief Executive of that State. And why? I ask the gentleman from Florida, emphatically, why the Southern Democrats did thus refuse to take the pledge? I will answer for these Southern Democrats. I will answer for myself, as an humble member of the Democratic party. I desired no additional testimony to go to the people whom I had the honor to represent, either of my attachment to the Union or the Democratic party. The gentleman from Florida, though a son of Virginia, yet I fear, like some other sons of Virginia who have emigrated from her shores, has degenerated from the spirit of a true Virginian. I tell you, gentlemen, those associated with me upon this floor as Virginia Democrats, do not need the testimony of such pledges to our constituents, in order to assure them of our fidelity to the Union and the Constitution.

Mr. CABELL. The gentleman from Virginia says that he and his associates from Virginia are too well known to need any pledge or any declaration of sentiment upon this subject. Now, it happens that in the last Congress the delegation from Virginia was nearly equally divided upon all these questions upon which this pledge was made. I most respectfully ask that gentleman what is the true Virginia doctrine? for I find one portion of that delegation advocating one side of these questions and the other portion advocating another. I ask that gentleman, what is the true Virginia doctrine?

Mr. McMULLIN. I will answer with a great deal of pleasure, and I thank the gentleman for the interrogatory. The true Virginia doctrine is a strict construction of the Constitution of the country. [Laughter and applause.] I hope my friend from Florida will make such a declaration and stick to it. If he will, I will be with him. He says that upon the subject of the compromise the Virginia delegation were divided; and so they were; but they were not divided upon the great cardinal doctrines. If they were divided, how did that delegation act? They acted like statesmen and like men. They acted like friends of their country. And how was that? Why, we did not choose to make war on each other. But we acted upon the principle which I would recommend to the favorable notice of the party to which the gentleman from Florida belongs, as well as to some gentlemen who bear the cognomen of Democrats. It is a principle embodied in the poetical adage of Dr. Franklin:

"If we to the follies of our friends are blind,
Our friends will ever treat us kind;
But if we their follies expose,
Our friends will then become our foes."

I tell the gentleman from Florida that Virginia politicians have as their polar star a strict adherence to the Constitution of our country; and I tell that gentleman further, that the old Democratic party proper—the real Jeffersonian, Jacksonian, Hunker Democratic party—have been, as they now are, the real Union party of the country—the real friends of the Union. And because we have differences among ourselves; because some of my honorable colleagues and myself differ in reference to these compromise measures, is that any good substantial reason why we should come over and vote with the party to which the gentleman from Florida belongs? Mr. Chairman, I address myself to a body composed of men—men of sense—men of discriminating minds; and I beg to call their attention for a moment to this inquiry: Of whom is the Whig party composed? Who are its members? Go back to 1840, and what were its principles then? I ask the gentleman from Florida to tell us what were the principles of the Whig party then? Why, they were "Tip and Ty, log cabins, coon skins, cider barrels," and all that sort of flummery. [Laughter.] Sir, it was a disgrace. Aye, sir, it was a reflection upon the character of the American people! Where was the gentleman from Florida in the campaign of 1844?

Mr. CABELL. I was too young then to take part in it.

Mr. McMULLIN. My friend was a young man, but I suspect he knew how to sing some of those songs. I knew him well when a boy, and he was from one of the first families of Virginia. [Great laughter.] He left his native State, a very promising young gentleman, but I dare say when he arrived in Florida he felt too young to enter actively into that campaign. But I dare say he learned some of those songs out of that memorable "yaller kiver" book. [Laughter.] I desire that the gentleman from Florida shall inform his constituents—for if I understood him his speech was not made for the purpose of enlightening the House of Representatives upon the bill now under consideration, but for Buncombe—for his especial constituents—what were the principles of the Whig party in 1844? If I had the time and disposition to call the attention of the House and the country to the principles of that party, I think I could show that their principles had become obsolete. But I come back to the question to which I desire to call the attention of the House and the country, viz: the division in the Virginia delegation. How, I ask, would my friend from the Norfolk district, [Mr. MILLSON,] or my friend from the Lynchburg district, [Mr. BOGOCCK,] or any of my colleagues who differed with me upon these compromise measures, look, if they were to take counsel from the sage statesman from Florida, and vote with the Whig party for President—for the kind of play now seems to be that of making Presidents instead of attending to the ordinary legislation of the country. I ask the gentleman from Florida, how he could expect either of my colleagues to vote with him and the Whig party—a party with which they have no sort of identity, or union of feeling, or interest whatever? They do not agree upon any one political question. But if my colleagues differ with the Whig party upon every one of the items composing their political creed, can they be expected to abandon the Democratic party, or to abandon the nominee of the Democratic party, because, forsooth they happened to differ from their Democratic brethren upon a party question? Now, I ask gentlemen of this House, as intelligent and discriminating men, whether the gentleman from Florida or the Whig party have the right to expect that the Democratic party, whether Union Democrats, or, as gentlemen sometimes call them, the fire-eating Democrats, can cooperate with the Whig party, with whom they differ from A to Z? No, sir.

But the gentleman from Florida was pleased to say some other singular things. He charged, or rather attempted to make the impression upon the country, that the Democratic party, in the organization of the present Congress, had admitted into their legislative caucus the Free-Soil Democrats. Ah! I wonder if there were no Free-Soil Abolition Whigs in the Whig caucus? Why does not the gentleman tell his dearly-beloved constituents how many there were in his caucus? It will not do to tell tales out of school, and the gentleman is too well taught in his political school to tell tales.

Mr. CABELL. I thought this matter was gone over fully the first day of the session. The proceedings of that caucus were published, and are well known to the Whigs of the country. I say now to the gentleman from Virginia, as I said then, and as was said by others, that there are Free-Soilers who have acted with the Whig party, and there are Free-Soilers who have acted with the Democratic party. It was announced to the House then, and I say now, that Free-Soilers were in our caucus: but when they found that the Whig caucus were about to do what the Democratic caucus had failed to do, they left us, and refused to have any further affiliation with the Whig party. They retired from the caucus, and the resolutions were passed. These resolutions were introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] and were adopted by a large majority of the Whigs—the Northern Whigs elected to this House, and all the Southern Whigs which were there, voted for them as a matter of course.

Mr. McMULLIN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] tells the House that the Abolitionists withdrew from the caucus. If they withdrew, how many were left in the caucus? There was not a baker's dozen. But the gentleman from Florida has very adroitly, but, I think, not liberally, attempted to make the impression upon his constituents—for which purpose his speech was made—that the Whig party is not identified with the Abolition party. I ask the gentleman if he has forgotten the various votes and declarations and answers made by Mr. Fillmore, the now President of the United States, upon this slavery question? Has he forgotten the votes of Mr. Fillmore by which he recognizes the Abolition doctrines to the fullest extent? And has he forgotten that the great Daniel Webster—I suppose he is a Whig—said upon the Wilmot proviso, that it was his original thunder? Has not Mr. Webster so declared? And yet, in the face of this declaration, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] gets up and attempts to make this House and the country believe that the Democratic party are all real Abolitionists. I have so much respect for the gentleman from Florida, and for his integrity and high talents, that I regret that he has come down and acted the part of a common court-yard politician. [Laughter.] I regret, Mr. Chairman, that it has been the policy of the Whig party to attempt to gull and bamboozle and mislead the people in reference to this cry of "Union!" "Union!" and to make them believe they are the only Union party. It is a slander upon the dead and the living. The Democratic party have ever been regarded, since the foundation of the Government, as the true Union party. I could go back and call your attention, if I had time, to facts which would bear me out in the declaration. But it is unfortunate that, instead of the ordinary legislation of the country—and many of the citizens of our country are suffering, greatly suffering, for the want of legislation—that everything is made to bend to President making. The gentleman from Florida—whether the leader of his party or not—has led off to-day, and I could have advised him to have saved his thunder for a more proper occasion, and to have waited until the resumption of the consideration of the President's message, when it would be a fit occasion for all gentlemen who have been nursing their wrath to pour it out upon the heads of their political adversaries. That would be a more suitable occasion for such a purpose than this, when the poor soldiers, many of whom are suffering for the want of the passage of this bill, and to which I beg leave to call the attention of the committee for a few moments.

I have received letter upon letter from my constituents appealing to me to get the House of Representatives and the Senate to pass this bill, if it is possible. Sir, that meritorious class of your citizens consider that they have been greatly aggrieved and injured by the invidious distinction drawn between the soldiers of the Mexican war and the soldiers of the preceding wars. It was an invidious distinction; and at this period of the session we ought to have taken up this bill and passed it; and if explanations were to enable us to pass it, those gentlemen who have made themselves familiar with the subject would have explained it—instead of taking the extraordinary course which has been pursued. Let me ask the gentleman from Florida a question. Suppose—and I presume there are members upon this floor as anxious to please their constituents as the gentleman from Florida—suppose the two hundred and thirty-three members of this House should imagine they must get up and make a political speech upon this little bill for the benefit of the poor soldier, what would become of it? You would not have time to pass the appropriation bill or the civil and diplomatic bill. And I hope—while I do not mean to set myself up as a sort of general lecturer, but the gentleman from Florida being somewhat peculiar, having hailed originally from Virginia, I thought I could take some liberties in dealing rather gently with him—that this very modest lecture which I have taken the liberty of reading to the gentleman from Florida may be regarded by others.

Mr. CABELL. I have merely to say I feel very much indebted to the gentleman for the lecture, coming from so reverend a source; and I am one of those who have been so long acquainted with the gentleman from Virginia, who has reminded the House that he was an acquaintance of mine when he was a member of the Virginia Legislature, and when I was quite a small boy, in the city of Richmond. I am an admirer of his, and have observed his course, and I have observed that scarcely a day passes that he does not undertake to enlighten this House upon some subject; and the members of the House will bear me out in saying there is hardly a day passes in which the honorable gentleman does not speak either for Buncombe, or Little Tennessee, or for the House and the country. But I think it is but once before, since the House met, that I have occupied two minutes of their time. I have now availed myself of this occasion, because I thought it was necessary that I should place myself right before my constituents in regard to important political movements—I say, I have just now availed myself of this occasion for that purpose, and for the first time followed the example of the very venerable Representative from the State of Virginia; and I ask the gentleman to do me the justice to say that I have not departed from his advice except upon this one occasion.

And I will further state, that I am as anxious as he or any man can be, for the passage of this bill; and I have heretofore refrained from addressing the House, with a view of enabling them to expedite action upon it; but being aware that there were several gentlemen around me who were desirous of making political speeches, in no manner relating to the question before the House, I availed myself of the privilege usually allowed.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] allow me to make a motion?

Mr. McMULLIN. I cannot yield for such a purpose.

Mr. COBB. I want to profit by your admonition. I suggest that a motion be made that the committee rise, with a view to adopt a resolution to close debate, at some time, say to-morrow at two o'clock.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

Mr. COBB. And then you will get the floor and finish your speech. If we do not do so, we shall never get through with the discussion.

Mr. McMULLIN. I assure the gentleman from Alabama, that it is my desire to have the vote taken upon the bill as soon as possible. I hope the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] will pardon me for saying that I have no doubt of the sincerity of all he has said, and I thank him for having told the House and the country, that I have attempted, almost every day, to enlighten the House and the country. But that question I will not debate, but refer to the records of the House. If the gentleman from Florida will give some little evidence of repentance for his political sins, and also by coming over upon the Democratic side of the House, I would say, Go forward, brother; give in your adhesion to the Democratic faith; sin no more, and we will take you under our charge.

Mr. BISSELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McMULLIN. I have not yet yielded the floor.

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman has so many endings, that I hope he will excuse me for not knowing when he has ended. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMULLIN. Certainly, certainly.

I desire that this bill shall pass, and that speedily. The interest of a large proportion of my constituents is suffering for the want of its passage. I know the fact that there have been great sacrifices made for the want of the passage of a law like this. Persons have attempted to violate the late law, or disregard it, by making sale of land warrants and depending upon the veracity of those who sold them not to interfere with the contract. Pass this bill speedily, and you will confer a great favor upon the soldier, who is entitled to the sympathies of the House and of this country. I hope when the President's message shall be again up for consideration, that both the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] and myself will have the privilege of defining our positions generally, and that of the respective parties to which we belong.

I tell the gentleman from Florida, much as he supposes that I have attempted to enlighten this House and this country, that when that subject comes before this House, I will claim my privilege to be heard. Whether or not I have trespassed upon the time or patience of the House, is a question to be settled between my constituents and myself. I have an overfondness for talking, and when it becomes necessary for me to talk or say something, in my humble way, in reply to attacks, such as have been made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] to-day, I shall do so regardless of consequences.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move that the committee rise, with a view to offer a resolution closing debate upon the question under consideration.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order of the House, being Senate bill 146, entitled "An act to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," and that it had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House upon the state of the Union, on the bill of the Senate, (No. 146,) entitled "An act making land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," shall cease at one o'clock on to-morrow, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion upon the same;) and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending, or offered to the same, and shall then report it to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I move to strike out "to-morrow at one o'clock," and to insert "to-morrow week at one o'clock." I would inquire of the Chair whether that amendment is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. POLK. Is the resolution now susceptible of amendment?

The SPEAKER. A proposition of amendment by the gentleman from Illinois is now pending.

Mr. POLK. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAMPBELL] will withdraw his amendment and substitute to-morrow at three o'clock. I am opposed to the resolution as originally introduced. If the time is fixed for to-morrow at one o'clock, the morning hour will be consumed. I desire to explain the action of the Democratic caucus.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind gentlemen that debate is not in order.

Mr. POLK. I then call for the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to have the order of the House by which this was made the special order, read, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the resolution in its present form is really in order. I understand the special order to have been to include not only the Senate bill, but also the House bill upon that subject. If the House has so ordered, is it competent for the House to divide that special order and make two of it? I inquire whether the resolution should not include the bill of the House as well as that of the Senate? I make this suggestion with a view of preventing any difficulty that may grow out of it. I hope the mover of the resolution will so modify it as to include both bills.

Mr. HARRIS. If it is in my power I will do so. I desire to have the debate closed upon the whole subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify his resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I will so modify it that debate shall cease upon both propositions—the bill of the Senate as well as that of the House.

The SPEAKER. The modification will be made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will suggest to my colleague another modification, which will be, that debate shall close upon both of these bills two hours after their consideration shall again be resumed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. POLK. I rise to a point of order. I moved the previous question, and would like to know whether any motion is in order in the face of that call?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify his resolution before action is had.

Mr. POLK. If the demand for the previous question is made?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BISSELL. I wish merely to suggest that this is a Senate bill, which has not been considered in a committee, nor discussed in the House. I say we are closing debate upon it too soon. The bill requires a little explanation, and unless the mover of the resolution adopts the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, to close the debate two hours after we go into committee, I shall feel constrained to move to lay the resolution upon the table. This bill requires explanation. I hope the gentleman will accept that modification.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish only to consult the sense of the House, as to the time when this debate shall cease in the Committee of the Whole. I have no choice as to the particular hour; and as several gentlemen around me suggest the propriety of modifying the resolution so as to close debate two hours after the committee shall have resumed the consideration of the subject, I will so modify it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. There was a resolution offered here to which I offered an amendment, and to my amendment, I believe, there was another amendment made. There the matter, I think, should stop. I was told I had no right to discuss this subject, notwithstanding which, motions have been entertained, and subjects discussed, ever since I offered my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had no design of doing the gentleman injustice.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am well aware of that. I am only speaking with regard to the action of gentlemen, and desire to suggest to the Chair the position which this resolution now occupies. I might be permitted to say that I am not tenacious about prolonging the debate for a whole week. I would be willing to fix any reasonable time for the consideration of this subject, and particularly for the consideration of the Senate bill, which has never been before the House nor any committee. It is an important subject, and I do think the opponents of the bill should not check this matter at once. I will fix any reasonable time gentlemen are willing to agree upon, that we may have some opportunity of discussing the merits of the bill as it is now before us. I move to strike out "in two hours after the committee shall resume their consideration," and to insert in lieu thereof "on Thursday next, at two o'clock."

Mr. POLK. I insist upon my call for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers, upon the second; which were ordered; and Messrs. JONES, of Tennessee, and CHANDLER were appointed.

The House was then divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 45. So there was a second, and the main question was then ordered to be put.

A VOICE. Read the resolution as modified.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill of the Senate (No. 146), as also joint resolution No. 1, entitled "An act making land warrants assignable, and for other purposes;" and also joint resolution (No. 1) explanatory of the act approved September 28, 1850, granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States, shall cease in two hours after the committee shall resume their consideration, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion upon the same); and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending, or offered to the same, and shall then report it to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The main question is first upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. POLK. I move that the debate be closed on Thursday at three o'clock. I do it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] who reported the bill.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by the universal consent of the House, the previous question having been sustained.

Mr. CLINGMAN objected.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the resolution; and it was agreed to—ayes 71, noes 59.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARTTER moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman, whether it would not be better to clear the Speaker's table.

Mr. CARTTER. It cannot be done—it is too late in the day.

The question was then taken and agreed to, and The House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 4, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

NON-INTERVENTION.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, yesterday and the day before I was detained from the Senate by severe indisposition, from which I have not yet recovered. During my absence yesterday, I perceive from the papers, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] called the attention of the Senate to the resolutions which I some time since offered in relation to the doctrine of intervention, and gave an intimation that he wished to address the Senate upon it to-day. I desire now to say to the Senate, that the Senator from Michigan and myself, as he stated, had had a conversation on the subject, and fearing that I might not be able to enter upon the discussion of those resolutions—for I was discouraged by my indisposition—it was agreed between us that he might proceed with the discussion of his substitute, if I should not be able to proceed with the explanation of the original resolution, which I was entitled to do by the usual courtesy of the Senate. But this morning we have had another conversation, and the Senator from Michigan, with his proverbial kindness, has agreed that the consideration of the resolutions may be further postponed to Monday next, when I hope to be able to proceed with the discussion—I trust my health will permit me to do so—but if I should be so unfortunate as not then to be able to proceed myself, that the Senator from Michigan shall have the floor for that day. If, however, I shall be able to speak on Monday next, and that day should be occupied by me, it is understood that the Senator from Michigan will be ready to proceed on Tuesday. Of course we cannot control this matter, but we desire that such an arrangement may agree with the convenience of the Senate. With that view, I move that the resolutions may now be taken up, that their consideration may be postponed to Monday next. I make this request thus early, because I shall be obliged very soon to leave the Senate Chamber, not being able to remain throughout the day.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, is it in order to move to instruct the Naval Committee in relation to that memorial? If it is in order, I move that the committee be instructed to inform the Senate how much the expeditions got up under this same Mr. Charles Wilkes, some years ago, have cost already. I think the Senate ought to have that information before the committee act upon this petition.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator cannot make the motion in that way.

Mr. PEARCE. That information has been given to the Senate long ago.

Mr. HALE. Well, I will endeavor to get at it in some other way.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inform the Senator that he must introduce a resolution in the usual form, in order to instruct a committee.

Mr. HALE. I will obtain the information in some way.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the documents in relation to the claim of William S. Waller, praying compensation for disposing and selling of certain Treasury notes, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Public Buildings, to which was referred the subject, reported a bill to provide for the fitting up of a temporary room for the Congressional Library; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

He also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT. I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of E. Pavenstadt and F. A. Schumacher, of the city of New York, and that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I also make a report upon the subject, which I ask may be printed. The object of the committee is this: It seemed to the Committee of Claims, that this matter should have been referred, in the first place, to the Committee on Commerce. The claim is of this character: These persons, merchants of the city of New York, imported a number of packages of goods. They afterwards sold those packages, and placed them on board a French ship, to be conveyed to New Orleans. These parties executed a bond to the Government, the condition of which was, that in four months they would supply the custom-house officers of New York with evidence of the deposit of the goods at the New Orleans custom-house. It appears that the goods were lost at sea, and the claimants ask that there shall be refunded to them the money which they were obliged to pay upon this bond. I apprehend that it is a matter of a great deal of consequence to the Government, for if this application of these parties is sustained, it will involve a large expenditure by requiring the refunding of duties in similar cases.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator is a very unusual one. The Chair understands the Senator to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of a subject upon which he makes a report.

Mr. PRATT. I have stated the reason for this unusual procedure. The report states the views of the Committee of Claims in regard to the matter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, rose subsequently and said: There is some difference in the manner of proceeding in the House and in the Senate on such memorials. At the time the Senator from Maryland made his report I was under the impression that these matters were considered by the Committee on Commerce in the Senate; they are referred to that committee in the House of Representatives. I learn, however, on conferring with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that they have uniformly gone to the Committee on Finance in the Senate. I therefore move that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the consideration of that memorial, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of three memorials of the citizens of Pittsburg, on the subject of a ship canal around the Falls of the St. Mary's river.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of William Newbold, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the petition of the Italian Mutual Benevolent Society, reported adversely thereon, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. DOWNS subsequently moved a reconsideration of the vote discharging the committee; which was agreed to, and the motion to discharge the committee was laid upon the table.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the payment of outstanding loan-office and final-settlement certificates issued for money loaned for services or for supplies during the revolutionary war, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WALKER. This subject was before the Committee on Revolutionary Claims at the last session of Congress. I was spoken to with regard to the reference at this session, and I mentioned to the Senator who proposed to refer it to that committee, that it had been reported upon. It is no longer a subject of investigation. It has once passed the ordeal of examination. These demands have been already adjudicated, and the only question now is, whether we shall pay these final-settlement certificates which have been issued under this adjudication. There is, therefore, nothing for the Committee on Revolutionary Claims to do in the matter. It is for the Committee on Finance to see whether they shall be paid, and not for the Committee on Revolutionary Claims to reexamine and redetermine on the justice of the claims.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a claim arising out of matters connected with the revolutionary war, and things of this sort have always been referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. If the Senator thinks this a plain case, he may readily report a bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill for the benefit of the Carmelite Nunnery, of Baltimore, reported it without amendment, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill to increase the salary of the district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill increasing the salary of the district judge of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLEMENS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation therein mentioned, and to confirm the title of Charles G. Gunter thereto; which was read a first and second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of the President and Directors of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad Company, reported a bill for the relief of said company; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the petition of Bryan Callaghan, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Alexander Y. P. Garnett, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution for his relief.

The resolution was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of S. H. Duff, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to which was referred the petition of Peter U. Morgan, administrator of John Arnold, deceased, and George G. Bishop, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of George G. Bishop and the legal representatives of John Arnold, deceased.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

INDIGENT INSANE PERSONS.

Mr. SHIELDS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill making a grant of lands to the several States of the Union for the relief and support of indigent insane persons; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to a select committee, consisting of five members, to be appointed by the President pro tem.

The following Senators were subsequently appointed: Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. PEARCE, Mr. HAMLIN, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. BELL.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SOULE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish a navy-yard and depot near the city of New Orleans; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

FORTIFICATIONS OF SAN FRANCISCO BAY.

Mr. GWIN. I have a resolution which I wish to offer. I see by the report of the Board of Engineers for the Pacific coast, that there is a statement to this effect:

"This Board, constituted under orders of 17th June, 1851, for the purpose of studying the system of defence for the Pacific coast, is sedulously engaged on projects for the entrance to San Francisco bay; and I hope soon to present plans in support of an appropriation for the commencement of a work there early next year."—Report of 14th November, 1851, to the Secretary of War.

I want to obtain information in regard to that appropriation; I therefore offer the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate what amount of money, if any, has been recommended by the Board of Engineer officers charged with planning the fortifications of San Francisco Bay, to be appropriated at the present session of Congress, for the immediate commencement of those fortifications.

The resolution was agreed to.

CENSUS RETURNS.

Mr. BADGER. I ask the permission of the Senate to take up for a moment the joint resolution to provide for the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census, simply for the purpose of laying upon the table an amendment which I propose to offer to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH.] I am in favor of compromises and adjustments, and I think the amendment which I propose to offer will be a reasonable medium between the proposition offered by my friend from Connecticut and the joint resolution on the table, and such a one as I think there can be no reasonable objection to. It will remove all difficulty as to the work not being faithfully executed, and will, at the same time, relieve us from such a business as putting out such a work to the lowest bidder. By the unanimous consent of the Senate, I hope the amendment to the amendment will be printed.

The motion to take up the joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER then offered the following amendment:

Strike out from the amendment to the amendment all after the words "it shall be the duty of," and insert the following:

"the Joint Committee on Printing to contract with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong for printing and binding the Census, on such terms as the committee may think reasonable and proper; the work to be executed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and to be paid for from time to time during the progress of the work by the head of the Census Bureau, under the direction of the Secretary, with power in the Secretary to abate from the amount stipulated, if the work when executed shall prove deficient or below the standard which may be agreed upon."

Mr. GWIN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Michigan in his speech, but I give notice that I shall call up the joint resolution in the morning; and I hope the Senate will then be prepared to act upon it.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, and that the proposed amendment be printed.

ENGROSSED BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read the third time and passed:

An act to change the times for holding the district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes;

An act to provide for the appointment of a Superintendent of Indian affairs in California;

An act to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the naval service of the United States; and

An act amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," approved July 29, 1850.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL BY BREVET.

Mr. GWIN submitted informally several amendments, which he will hereafter offer, to the joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to confer the title of Lieutenant General by brevet for eminent services; and they were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CASS, for the same purpose, submitted the following; which was ordered to be printed:

Provided, however, That when the said grade of Lieutenant General by brevet shall have once been filled and have become vacant, this act shall thereafter expire and be of no effect.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

Mr. FELCH resumed and finished the speech which he commenced yesterday in favor of the bill, and against the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the report of which will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. BELL. I agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan, particularly since I have heard his concluding remarks, as well as some remarks in the preceding stage of his argument, that this is becoming a serious and important question, and deserves not only a grave consideration, but perhaps a fuller discussion than we have yet had upon it. If I understand the honorable Senator, he is strongly impressed with the belief that the fate of our land system generally—of our mode of appropriating the public lands—may be broken down or destroyed, if there is any interference with the practice of making these appropriations for internal improvements in the new States. If that be so, the question is highly deserving of further consideration; and I should like to hear a fuller development of the views of the honorable Senator upon that point. There was conveyed, in the manner and gravity with which he announced this sentiment, not only a warning, but something of a threat also. I am not insensible that it may be wise in the Senator to give his timely warning, and to give it in whatever shape he may think proper; for I have had my ears open, and I have seen, too, the progress of sentiments which may lead to that result; and it will be the part of wisdom of the Congress of the United States, if they think the policy to which he alludes is not wise and proper, to pursue a conciliatory, liberal, and just policy. But nevertheless, I think that some considerations of justice, of equality, and of right, in regard to all other sections of the Union, may be well coupled with it.

There were some other remarks made by the honorable Senator, which I ought not to say astonished me; they struck me with surprise, but perhaps it was owing to my own inadvertence, want of attention to, and ignorance of, facts which I ought to have known. In some of the new States if I understand the honorable Senator, some four fifths, and in some nine-tenths, of the public domain yet remain unsold. And yet I have seen from session to session, and from Congress to Congress, for the last fifteen years, an extraordinary desire to extend, and yet to extend still further, to open the claims of the United States free from the possession and right of occupancy by the Indian tribes, of territory still further and further into the wilderness. My attention has not been drawn in detail to this subject, although you may remember that the discussion which we have had this session may be said to be an annual discussion in its general features and aspects, and is assuming a still greater and greater importance at every Congress. You may remember that the type of this discussion may be traced back in Congressional history for the last twenty years. It has only received some additional and further developments, as the public domain has increased, as new States have been admitted, as the western borders have extended, and as new questions have arisen regarding the rights of the new States. As these have become larger, new ideas have been presented. On that account there is some novelty in this discussion.

I do not mean to enter into this argument in detail, but there are some views upon the subject which I wish to submit briefly to the Senate. I have not studied the question, but I have listened with great attention to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH,] who has treated the subject fully, ably, and, in many respects, very fairly and candidly. There are some other points of policy with regard to the mode in which opposition to this course of the appropriation of the public lands has been kept up and maintained by our State-rights friends. I hope they will not consider me as speaking in any disparagement, if I allude to a course of policy which has tended as much as any other to defeat a just, equitable, and liberal policy in regard to the appropriation of the public lands heretofore.

It is suggested to me that I had better give way to a motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow, so that we may proceed to the consideration of Executive business. I am willing to do so. But I give notice that I do not wish to make a set speech, for I have taken no notes; though there are some points which I think of great importance which I wish to bring before the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. I move, then, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow, for the purpose of going into Executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after a short time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HARVESTING MACHINE.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the third reading of an engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall."

The bill was then read the third time.

Mr. CARTTER demanded the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was then taken, and it was not agreed to.

The question now being, Shall the bill pass?—Mr. JONES demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. JONES. I ask for the reading of the bill. I wish to see whether—

Mr. CARTTER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. JONES. It is too late. I wish to know whether this bill does not grant a patent for fourteen years?

Mr. CARTTER. It does for fourteen years.

The bill was then read by the Clerk.

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed.

Mr. CARTTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The SPEAKER stated, as the next business in order, the question on ordering the bill "to encourage agriculture, and for other purposes," to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HALL. I do not know what disposition the House may intend to make of this bill; but I move now to amend it by inserting after the word "widow" in the first line, the words "being a white person." The amendment will make that portion of the bill conform to the preemption law. We have never given preemptions to any other than white persons, and I think there ought to be the same restriction in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will just say to the House, that a bill containing provisions similar to those contained in this bill, was introduced, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and reported favorably on to the House. That bill is now in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and among the first upon the Calendar. This bill has been read twice, and is now, I understand, upon its engrossment. Now, this is a measure of very great importance, and one in which much interest is felt throughout the whole country—the public mind being directed to making essential changes in the present land system. I will, therefore, if there is no objection, move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be made the special order of the day for the first Tuesday of March next, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of; and also, that the bill No. 7, upon the same subject, now in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, be made the special order for the same day.

There being no objection, the motion was considered and agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER stated, as the next business in order, the question on the engrossment for a third reading of the bill to regulate the publication of the laws of the United States and of the public advertisements, which had been reported back from the Judiciary Committee, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. SMART. I wish to say that this bill was introduced by me at an early period of the session, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that during my late illness it was reported back to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass. I regret that it should come before the House under such auspices, for having been placed in the position in which it is, it may be that it will not receive much favor at the present time. But I hope that the principles of this bill may be understood by the country, and I think that, if they are understood, the time is not far distant when something of the kind will be adopted by Congress.

I will now explain the character of this bill in a very few words, and, for the purpose of doing so, I ask for the reading of the bill, that I may make it a part of my remarks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the selection of newspapers for the publication of the laws of the United States shall, after the passage of this act, be made by the Secretary of State, as follows: The number selected shall be, in each Congressional district, two; in each Territory, two; in the District of Columbia, four; and a preference shall be given, in all cases, to the papers which may have the largest weekly subscription, to be ascertained by the affidavit of the editors, respectively, and by such additional evidence as may be requisite to establish the facts in each case.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the public advertisements of the United States shall be published in one or more Congressional districts, according to the nature of the advertisement and the propriety of giving it a general, a partial, or a local circulation; said advertisements to be published in such papers, and such only, as may have been selected in said district or districts according to the terms of this act for the publication of the laws.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said public advertisements shall be published in the newspapers having the publication of the laws as aforesaid in the District of Columbia, and in the papers having the publication of said laws in the Territories, when and as often as may be deemed necessary.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and at the commencement of the first session of every succeeding Congress, a copy of the list of newspapers selected according to the terms of said act, for the publication of the laws of the United States, shall be communicated by the Secretary of State to the heads of the Departments, and to the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President shall cause to be communicated to the Senate and House of Representatives, annually, a list of all newspapers that shall have published, during the preceding year, any advertisements as aforesaid, with the names of the publishers, the place of publication, the nature of the work performed, and the amount paid to each publisher.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMART. This bill proposes, in the first place, to authorize the publication of the laws of the United States in the two papers having the largest weekly circulation in each Congressional district. In addition to that, it proposes to give the publication of the public advertisements, whenever it may be necessary for a local, partial, or general circulation, in the papers thus selected in one or more Congressional districts. I have given, it will be seen, the preference to papers having the largest weekly circulation, because this circulation reaches the great masses of the people in the rural districts. It goes to the intelligent population of the country, and is not confined, like the daily circulation, to the city. I claim for this bill the merit that it divorces the press from the Government; that it entirely disconnects the press from governmental control. I claim this as one of the merits of the bill.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to a very few remarks upon this subject. I will promise not to detain gentlemen long. I desire especially to call their attention to the fact that this Government, like all other Governments, is tending rapidly towards centralization. And for one I wish to do all I can—if I may be permitted to use the expression—to decentralize the central power. This Government has an enormous patronage under its control. Under the Whig administration of John Quincy Adams, the whole expenditure of the Government did not exceed $13,000,000. But how is it now? Why, under the present Whig administration, the expenditure of the Government is nearly $50,000,000. I say, sir, you have an enormous patronage, all tending to increase the central power of the Government. In addition to this you have, under the existing laws, control over the public press to a very large extent. I ask gentlemen to look to the city of New York. There are, in that city alone, a thousand employes in and about the custom-house, with a salary of more than a thousand dollars each on an average, all under the control of this Whig administration, and identified with the Whig party. There are a regiment of men there, with leisure to do what they please in political matters.

Every gentleman upon this floor knows the true secret of getting up political influence in the large cities and large towns. It is done through these men of leisure. They are the persons who control public sentiment in their localities. But I say the patronage of the Government is large enough, it is abundantly sufficient to concentrate the power of the Government without the aid of the press. And I claim for the proposition which I have introduced into this House, the merit that it will have a tendency to decentralize that power by divorcing the press from the control of the Government. How are the papers now selected by the Government for the publication of the laws? The Administration selects two papers in each State to publish the laws of the United States. Nor is this all. The influence of the publishers of the public advertisements is tremendous. The list of names of printers and publishers in the Blue Book covers twenty-five pages. There are about forty names on a page, making, in all, nearly one thousand who are thus pensioned by the Government, to say nothing of the publishers of the laws. Now, this proposition is calculated to take this entire patronage from the power of the Government—to divorce the press and State. I am a "Union man." But I am not for a union of Church and State, or of Bank and State, or of the Press and State. I am, in those respects, a "Disunionist." I want to dissolve the union of the press and the Government. Sir, I have looked into this subject—I have looked into a proposition, introduced many years ago by Col. Benton, which was to take this patronage of the press away from the General Government, and to give it to the Congressional delegations of the several States. But I saw that that proposition was liable to the same objection which exists under the present arrangement—that of placing the press under party control. I came to the conclusion, therefore, that the idea of the distinguished gentlemen to whom I have referred, would not accomplish the purpose which I desired to effect. I then concluded to adopt the proposition which I have introduced here, to select those presses which have the largest circulation in the several Congressional districts. But, as I remarked in the outset, I do not intend to detain the House long, and perhaps I have said enough upon this point.

Another merit which I claim for this proposition is, that it will give an equal, just, and fair circulation to the laws of the United States, precisely in proportion to the peculiar character of the people whom you command to obey those laws. And the present system does not do this. What is the character of the present system of publishing the laws of the country? Why, the Administration now in power have, with the exception of two or three "religious papers," in every instance selected a party paper, and the consequence is, that the whole Democratic press of the country are excluded. This has been done, with the exceptions I have named, in every instance. I desire to call your attention for a moment to my own State. In the State of Maine, there is a newspaper circulation of about sixty-one thousand of papers published in the State, and of course papers published out of the State circulate largely within its limits. Mr. Webster has selected the Christian Mirror, in the city of Portland, as one of the two papers in the State to publish the laws. It is a very respectable Christian organ, of the orthodox Congregational Society, with about three thousand subscribers. I have nothing to say against the paper. It is a very respectable one, but it affords a circulation of the laws of the United States only to the society of which it is the organ in my State. But what other paper did he select? The Bangor Whig, with a merely local circulation in a single county. And that is the circulation which you give to the laws of the United States in the State of Maine, when you tell all the people in that State they must obey those laws. What said that pure-minded statesman, Silas Wright, upon the subject of the circulation of the laws of his own State? I ask the attention of the House while I read from his letter to Mr. Hickey, who compiled this copy of the Constitution of the United States. He says:

"It has long been a favorite wish of mine, as to this State, that our public laws of universal interest may be by our Legislature distributed to our common schools, in a form to be made a class-book for the more advanced scholars, that the current legislation of the State may be easily and thoroughly understood by those who are to be the voters of the State."

By those who are to be the voters of the State. That was the opinion of Silas Wright in relation to the laws of the State of New York. Now I ask, if the laws passed by the most important deliberative body in the country are of any importance, should they not be circulated, and generally circulated, at least to the extent which you circulate your State laws? I might say something of the circulation of the laws of the State of Maine. We have, as I before remarked, a newspaper circulation of papers published in the State amounting to sixty-one thousand. Well, sir, we circulate a copy of the laws of that State annually to every subscriber of a paper within the limits of the State. But you circulate the laws of the United States to how many? Why, to about five thousand persons. To about four thousand or five thousand in the whole State of Maine—a State containing six hundred thousand inhabitants! Now, I find by the census returns, that the circulation of newspapers in the United States is about three millions, and you give a circulation to the laws of the United States of about one hundred and twenty thousand. I have made this estimate hastily, but I think it cannot be far out of the way. That is the circulation which you give to your laws. You command all the Democrats and all the Whigs and all the Abolitionists in the country to obey those laws, but you will not permit them to see them—you will not send the laws to them. I maintain, that if you expect the people of the country to obey your laws, you ought to afford the requisite facilities to the people for becoming acquainted with them.

I now come to the great objection to this proposition, viz: that it will cost something. And upon that objection I beg to make a single remark. I always find gentlemen in every deliberative assembly who are very stringent upon expenses in some matters, and yet who are very loose and liberal in others. Now, I make this distinction: I say where the thing is really necessary for the good of the country, where it is essential to the welfare of the public, that the expense is a secondary consideration. And, according to that rule, I say that in this case it is a secondary consideration. But where there is an extravagant expenditure of the public money, I will go as far as any other man to curtail. But I repeat, in this case the expenditure which is incurred in disseminating this important information to the people, should not be regarded. It goes all over the country, and is expended for a laudable purpose—for a purpose which justifies the expense. The expenditure for this publication, I will state, according to my estimate, would be about $75,000. Even this amount may be much reduced by reducing the compensation to publishers. The expenditure is not a legitimate or fair objection to the proposition.

I did not intend, when I arose, to do anything more than merely to explain this proposition, and place it before the House and the country in its proper light. I hope the House and the country will take it up and carry it out. I desire, however, to say one word more in relation to an idea which I have already suggested. I allude to the influence which politicians, and the Government, exercise over the press of the country. It is well known that when a usurper, no matter whether he be great or small—no matter whether he be a Napoleon, or any man in any Congressional district in the country—when he wishes to take possession of the liberties of the people—when he wishes to carry out his plans in opposition to the interests of the people—he seizes first upon the press. He monopolizes the whole of the public press. That is the first thing he does. That was the first thing done by Louis Napoleon, when he usurped the control of the liberties of the people of France. We ought to be jealous of a union of the press and the Government. This system is now growing up. The printers who are pensioned upon the Government now number more than one thousand. It is growing to be a dangerous power; and the time will come when, if it be not arrested, it will be a fearful power to be wielded by any Administration. I do not intend that these remarks shall have a party application. They are as applicable to one party as the other. They are as applicable to the Whig party as the Democratic party; and they are as applicable to the Democratic party as the Whig party. All parties are liable to abuse power—all Governments are liable to abuse such a power. It is for the people to watch their Government. It is for the people to watch those who attempt to control the press and to promote centralism, and to check them in time against the exercise of any undue power in the premises.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I had the honor to report the bill now under consideration, back to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass. I should, at that time, have moved that the bill lay upon the table, but for the fact that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] was not then in his seat. I knew he desired to be heard upon the subject, and I desired to extend to him the opportunity of doing so. I shall, however, before I take my seat, make that motion.

I wish briefly to submit to the House a few facts in relation to this proposition. The first one that addressed itself to my mind, was the great difference in the cost of publishing the laws of the United States. Under the present system, the Secretary of State selects two newspapers in each State in the Union for the publication of such laws. Under this bill, he would be required to select two newspapers in each Congressional district in the Union. I find the expense, at present, to be about $12,200 per annum for publishing the laws of the United States, in the two newspapers now selected in each State for that purpose. But under this bill—by a calculation that I have made, and which I believe to be correct—I find the expense would be about $92,200 per annum; making a difference of $80,000 a year. I cannot find any corresponding benefit accruing to any one—no benefit that can correspond with this immense increase of expenditure.

Mr. CARTTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he sees any benefit in expending the $12,000?

Mr. HARRIS. I was just going to remark, that from the investigation I have given this subject, I entertain the opinion that there is no benefit to any one arising from the publication of the laws of the United States in newspapers, except to the man who prints them, and gets his proportion of the $12,000. For when a gentleman desires to know what the laws of the United States are, he goes to the statutes of the United States, or he consults his lawyer to obtain that information. Is there a gentleman upon this floor, who knows of a solitary case where a man has gone to the newspapers of the county for the purpose of learning what are the laws of the United States.

Mr. SMART. I believe my friend is a professional man, and I will ask him if he has not had men come into his office and often inquire of him about the bounty land law, and whether it is not in such a paper, and whether he has not seen it? I have met with many such cases.

Mr. HARRIS. I answer it with pleasure. I have been asked often, and inquired of as to the different provisions of the bounty land law, and—

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, (interrupting.) I desire to inquire if the laws published in the newspapers would be received as authority by courts of law without being certified to?

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose not.

Mr. FULLER. That is my impression.

Mr. SMART. The argument of my friend proves too much. It goes against the publication of the laws at all.

Mr. HARRIS. I am against the change proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] and I see no material benefit to any one from the publication of the laws at all in the newspapers. This is the position I have taken, and I think it can be maintained; but that is not the question before the House.

But what is the argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] against the present system of publishing the laws, and in favor of the one he proposes? His objection to the present system is, that under it there is an excessive amount of Executive patronage growing out of the publication of these laws, and he is afraid of, and opposed to, this system, because of its tendencies to consolidation. Under the present system, the Secretary of State is to select two newspapers in each State of the Union in which the laws of the United States are to be printed. Now, if you refer to the bill upon your table, you will see that under it the Secretary of State shall select two newspapers in each Congressional district in the Union. The gentleman's facts destroy his argument.

Mr. SMART. I regret to interrupt the gentleman, but I think he misapprehends the bill.

The Secretary of State is not authorized to do anything about the selection further than to receive testimony as to which of the papers have the largest circulation, and decide upon the testimony according to the evidence. He has no discretion in the premises.

Mr. HARRIS. Then under the bill, as I stated before, the Secretary of State will have the selecting of the papers to publish the laws, and the disbursing, or rather of selection of the recipients of $92,200 a year, for the publication of the laws of the United States, instead of, under the existing laws, $12,200. You put into his hands, to be paid by this Government to the different presses of the country, the sum of $92,200 in the place of $12,200. You give him the power to select—under the rules the bill prescribes—two papers from each Congressional district to receive this patronage, instead of two papers in each State. Does not the bill give him more patronage, than under the law as it now exists? It gives him ninety-odd thousand dollars, instead of twelve thousand, and it gives him the selection of four hundred and seventy-eight papers instead of sixty.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not apprehend that we are in any great danger of consolidation, growing out of this question of publishing the laws of the United States in newspapers. Now, I am as much against a consolidated government as my friend from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] but I cannot see in this question of printing the laws in newspapers any very great danger that we are incurring of consolidating our Government. I think my friend from Maine is giving an undue importance to the distribution of this $12,000 of patronage. I do not think any serious injury can result from it, except the small injury that results to the Treasury—and under his bill a much greater injury would result to it, than now does—for the reason that the expenditure of $80,000 more a year, without benefiting the public or any individual, except the gentlemen who happen to get the printing. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was then being taken upon the motion of Mr. HARRIS, when—

Mr. SMART called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the special orders.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, upon the special orders, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The business before the committee is the special order, being Senate bill No. 146, making land warrants assignable and for other purposes.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I propose to submit, for the consideration of the committee, a few remarks in support of the propositions, on the subject of military bounty land warrants, as contained in the Senate bill. And it may not be inappropriate for me, at the present time, to refer briefly to the history of the proposition which is now before the committee for its consideration. At an early period of this session, the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] I believe, introduced a bill for the purpose of making land warrants assignable, which are not so under existing laws.

The provisions of that proposition met with the approbation of this House. It was enacted into a law, so far as the action of the House could accomplish that end, and sent to the Senate for its concurrence. After the passage of that bill, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] submitted his joint resolution proposing to accomplish the same thing with the first section of that law; but in addition to that, it contains other sections providing that the receivers and registers of the different land offices in the State where the public land is situated, should receive pay equal to the sum which they received under the cash entries for locating these warrants. And further, that those registers and receivers who have heretofore located these warrants, should also be paid for their services out of the Treasury of the United States. The resolution contains other propositions, to which it is not necessary for my purpose at this time to refer. Those resolutions were considered, and finally they were referred to a select committee, which committee, after grave consideration and solemn consultation, reported a bill back to this House, upon which it seemed, after the report had been made, there was not two of that committee who were able to agree. The builders of Babel were not more incomprehensible to each other than were the members of that committee after they returned from their committee-room into this House. The chairman of the committee, [Mr. DUNHAM,] immediately after he reported this bill, proposed an amendment to the first section himself, and thereupon a very interesting discussion grew up, confined principally to the members of that committee. Notwithstanding that, sir, a portion of that committee, with its chairman at its head, insist most pertinaciously their bill shall become the settled law. I am opposed to that bill. I am opposed to it in substance and in form.

But to proceed with the further history of the proposition contained in the bill now before the committee for consideration. While these matters were going on in the House, the first bill providing for the assignability of warrants had been sent to the Senate. The Senate then took up the whole subject—the joint resolution and all the proceedings which had taken place in this House, and, after mature deliberation, a bill passed that body, which was sent to this House for its concurrence, and referred to this committee, and is one of the propositions to be discussed at the present time. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] who reported the first resolution, seems to me to have changed the ground he first occupied on these resolutions. A very serious and marked change has come over the spirit of his dream. Notwithstanding the Senate bill combines, almost word for word and letter for letter, the proposition as contained in his bill, he seems to have abandoned his own bantling, and to have fixed himself upon this nondescript reported by this very select committee. Why this is marvelous and strange. The Senate could not have paid a higher compliment to the gentleman from Tennessee than it has done. It has embodied, as I said before, almost word for word the same sentiment and provisions which were contained in his original joint resolution. I apprehend that no member of this House could have submitted a proposition which would have received a higher compliment from the Senate of the United States, than the proposition has received from that body which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee submitted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. If it is any gratification to the gentleman from Illinois to know that I am opposed to the adoption of the resolution which proposes to pay registers and receivers for services heretofore performed, the gentleman may have that information. I introduced the joint resolution to which the gentleman referred, upon the first or second day after the organization of the House, stating at the time I did so, that they were the joint resolutions of the previous session, with the Senate amendments thereto, copied by one of the clerks. I had not, before offering it, scrutinized every feature it contained, my object being to get the proposition to make the warrants assignable before the House, knowing the House could correct any defect that might exist. They contained a feature which, upon investigation, I condemn, and to which I am opposed, and which opposition I expressed as soon as I investigated the subject. I oppose it for the reason that the existing laws provided for the compensation of these officers; and if that compensation was insufficient, they were not compelled to continue to hold the office. That feature is to pay to registers and receivers, for services heretofore performed under the then existing laws, an amount indefinite as to quantity and indefinite as to what number are to receive this pay. I am against the adoption of that principle, whether it appears in the original resolution introduced by myself, or in resolutions introduced by any other gentleman upon this floor, and shall vote to strike it from my own, and every proposition in which it is contained, feeling it to be my duty when, upon investigation, satisfied that a proposition is wrong, to correct the error, whether the proposition be reported by myself or another.

Mr. CAMPBELL, (resuming.) The gentleman is correct in the order of time in which his resolutions were offered; they preceded the bill of the gentleman from Alabama. I understand when a gentleman introduces a resolution, whether he has made an exact copy of any other resolution or not—whether he has introduced a resolution which was reported at the last session of Congress or not, that he indorses to the fullest extent every sentiment and principle it contains; that he adopts the proposition as his own, and submits it to the House for a candid and impartial consideration. If the gentleman has had reason since the time he introduced this resolution to change his opinions, that is a matter with himself; yet it may very well be considered as a matter of astonishment to those who do not understand the causes which produced this great change in the mind of the gentleman upon this particular subject, and I propose to show in the investigation of the subject, that the reason which the gentleman has just urged why he changed his opinions, is no reason at all. The amount which is to be paid is not indefinite. It is capable of being ascertained with mathematical certainty, and I propose, before taking my seat, to inform the gentleman of almost the precise amount which you

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 30.

will be called upon to legislate out of the Treasury, if the third section of this bill should be adopted. But to return. After the Senate had doubtless considered all of these propositions, they embodied a portion of the provisions of each into a bill which passed that body, was sent to this House for its concurrence, and which, with all the other propositions submitted, are now before this committee.

My object is to clear away from this Senate bill all the rubbish with which it is surrounded, and endeavor, so far as I am capable, to show that it should be enacted into a law with some slight modifications. A modification I propose to this, I apprehend, will remove all the objections which the gentleman has to that particular section of the law to which he has alluded. I hold, now, in the first place, that it is the policy of this Government to reward every public officer—all its public functionaries, all its agents, in proportion to the responsibility of the service which they are called upon to discharge. That is the policy of the Government, for the purpose of securing integrity, competency, and the faithful discharge of all the duties pertaining to the public offices, to allow such compensation as will place the officers beyond the reach of temptation. I would ask the Clerk to read the first section of the Senate bill.

"Be it enacted, &c., That all warrants for military bounty land, which have been or may hereafter be issued under any law of the United States, and all valid locations of the same, which have been, or may hereafter be made, are hereby declared to be assignable, by deed or instrument of writing, made and executed after the taking effect of this act, according to such form and pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owners of the warrant or location: Provided, That any person entitled to preemption right to any land shall be entitled to use any such land warrant in payment of the same, at the rate of $125 per acre, for the quantity of land therein specified."

I do not propose to occupy any time upon this first section of the Senate bill. That section has already met with the approbation of this House by an almost unanimous vote. There might have been an amendment made to this bill, but I do not propose to make it, because I desire that it shall meet with the hearty approbation of this House. The law of the 3d of March, 1851, restricted the location of warrants to lands subject to entry at the passage of that law; but as there is another proposition before this House, which I have had the honor of submitting, that relieves these warrants of the restrictions and limitations imposed upon them by the act of the 3d of March, 1851, I do not see fit, and it is not necessary, to disturb any of the provisions of this section at present.

I would say, that the amendment which was offered by the chairman of the select committee is embodied in this section, which relates more particularly to the form of making the transfer. I will now ask the Clerk to read the second section:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall each be entitled to receive fifty cents for his services in locating each bounty land warrant by him located, to be paid by the person or persons locating the same; but this act shall not be so construed as to allow any register or receiver to receive any greater maximum of salary and fees than by law he is now entitled."

I will submit whether an amendment to this section is now in order?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman, as I wish to vote correctly. Do you propose to go back and pay registers and receivers for services heretofore performed? Is there an express or implied obligation on the part of the Government to pay them for that duty? On the contrary, under the law authorizing warrants to be issued was it not distinctly indicated that the registers and receivers were to perform this duty voluntarily? If I am correct in this, why should we remunerate public officers for performing a duty which they have voluntarily agreed to perform?

Mr. CAMPBELL. When I come to this section of the law I will reply to the gentleman. I submit to the Chair whether it is now in order to propose an amendment to the second section?

The CHAIRMAN. Not until the first section is passed upon. That section is still under consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I shall move at the proper time, if no other member do so, to amend the second section of the bill, by striking out the following:

"Where they have been transferred under the provisions of any act of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office; and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the warrant was located by the soldier or warrantee, or his next of kin, as provided for by law."

My object in proposing this amendment, is to relieve gentlemen who are opposed to this section of the law, because it takes money out of the Treasury for the location of these warrants. The section, as it will then read if this amendment should be permitted to prevail, will require the holder of the warrant, whether he be an assignee of the original warrantee, or the original warrantee himself, to locate these warrants at his own expense. The objection which has been urged to this section of the bill, then will be wholly and entirely obviated. The question then recurs as to the justice and to the propriety of adopting the section as it stands amended. It is well known, that under the cash system, which has always been in operation, public officers, for their remuneration, receive a certain percentage for the entry of every tract of land. That constitutes the compensation for the labor which they are required to perform. Now, for the purpose of showing to the committee the nature of the service which the land officers are required to perform in entering a tract of land, I will send to the Speaker's table a reply to interrogatories which I addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, January 22, 1852.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 21st instant, in relation to the fees of registers and receivers, I have the honor to inform you, that—

For cash entries each register and receiver is entitled to one per cent. on the money paid, which for 160 acres is $2. This percentage is paid by the Government, and is all that is allowed to these officers for cash entries.

For locations by warrant, each register and receiver is entitled, under the act of May 17, 1848, for one hundred and sixty acres, fifty cents; for forty acres, twenty-five cents. This is paid by the locator, and applies to warrants issued under the law of February 11, 1847, only. For the location of warrants under the act of September 28, 1850, no fee is allowed by law.

In cash entries, the register notes the sale on his plats and tract book, files one certificate, and enters the sale in his monthly returns. In cash sales, the receiver issues one receipt for the money, enters the name of the purchaser in his monthly returns, and accounts for the money.

In the location of a land warrant, the register notes the location on his plat and tract book, fills one certificate, fills one application, and attests the signature of the locator, certifies that the location is correct, fills up the affidavit that the land is uncultivated, &c., enters the location in his monthly return, and when errors are discerned in the location or description of the tract, or the assignment is erroneous, the papers are returned to him for correction, and he is required to notify the parties, and the correspondence is often voluminous and long continued.

In the location of a land warrant, the receiver joins the register in certifying the location.

In cash entries, where errors occur, or confusions arise, the registers and receivers frequently are required to make examinations and conduct correspondence, but, generally, the necessary labor attending the location of a warrant is far greater than the duties required in cash sales.

I inclose copy of the law of 17 May, 1848, from which you will perceive, that when a warrant is located by or for the soldier, no fee is allowed the land officer.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. BUTTERFIELD, Commissioner.

HON. THOMPSON CAMPBELL,
House of Representatives.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hand of their Secretary, ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., transmitting sundry bills, and asking the concurrence of the House therein.]

Mr. CAMPBELL resumed. The operation of this section of the law is prospective, and proposes to pay to registers and receivers the same compensation for the location of warrants hereafter, which they have been in the habit of receiving where land was entered under the cash system.

Mr. MASON. With the permission of the gentleman, I wish to ask him a question, for I desire to have some information upon this subject. If this proposed compensation to registers and receivers is not granted, will the public service suffer at all by these men resigning, and the inability of the Government to get others at the same salary, without additional compensation? I should like to hear the gentleman's views upon that subject, as he lives in a section of country where these receivers and registers live.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, sir, with us, responsible men—men capable of discharging the duties of a responsible office, require for their services a sufficient salary, and if they did resign for want of it, we should be under the necessity of sending to the gentleman's State to get men who would be willing to attend to the duties of this office for the Government of the United States, without receiving a competent remuneration therefor. We have no men of that description in the State of Illinois, where I reside. I now propose to proceed with the discussion of this subject. My time is rapidly passing away, and the gentleman will have full opportunity of replying to me. Questions of the kind which have been propounded to me, are not calculated to shed much light on the subject now under consideration.

As I stated before, the operation of this section of the bill is prospective, and proposes to pay to registers and receivers the same compensation which they have been in the habit of receiving from the first organization of the land system, I believe, up to the present time, for their services. Now, the only question is, is it right—is it just? The Government selects its agents, and it pays them a percentage for performing a certain duty. The Government sees fit to change its policy: instead of disposing of its lands for cash, it adopts a new policy, and parts with all its interest in those lands by a different process. What is the nature of that process? Why we see, from the answers of the Commissioner of the Land Office to the interrogatories which I submitted to him, that, instead of the labors of these officers being in any way decreased, they are greatly increased by this new policy, and by the forms which the Land Department has adopted for the location of these warrants. I am unable, at this time, to make any distinction between a register and a receiver. They are both important and responsible officers. Why, sir, a receiver in the district in which I reside, is under the necessity of entering into bond in the sum of $100,000. Is any man for the paltry salary that is not sufficient to support him, willing to execute a bond to the amount of a hundred thousand dollars, when he is to receive no remuneration for the risk which he incurs? I apprehend not. These land officers are highly responsible. There are judicial attributes which attach to them. There are frequently vexed questions presented to them, which they are called upon to decide with regard to the preemption laws. They are required to take testimony, and decide upon that testimony, and the rights of the settler are deeply involved in their decisions. For these reasons it is necessary that we should have the most responsible men to discharge these duties.

Now the proposition which I make is for the warrantees or holders, whoever they may be, to pay the fee which is required to be paid for the location of these warrants. That is, for one hundred and sixty acres only two dollars—not quite two acres out of the one hundred and sixty acres of land which they receive by the location. I submit to gentlemen if that is unreasonable, or in any way unjust? While you are just and generous to the soldier who has fought your battles, do not tarnish the splendor of your bounty by any act of injustice to another class, who have been called from the walks of private life to the discharge of an indispensable public trust. If the system which has been practiced on for years is just and reasonable, then there can be no objection to the provisions which are contained in the second section of the bill.

I now ask the clerk to read the third section of the bill.

The CLERK read the section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That registers and receivers, whether in or out of office at the passage of this act, or their legal representatives in case of death, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States, for services heretofore performed in locating military bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation provided in the preceding section for services hereafter to be performed, after deducting the amount already received by such officers under the act entitled 'An act to require the holders of military land warrants to compensate the land officers of the United States for services in relation to the location of those warrants,' approved May seventeenth, eighteen hundred and forty-eight: Provided, That no register or receiver shall receive any compensation out of the Treasury for past services who has charged and received illegal fees for the location of such warrants: And provided further, That no register or receiver shall receive for his services during any year a greater compensation than the maximum now allowed by law."

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the section of the bill, I apprehend, to which the greatest objection will be urged. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] whose question I promised to answer when I took up this section for discussion, asked me whether there was any contract, either express or implied, on the part of the Government to pay these registers and receivers for this service. Sir, there is that implied contract which is good in law, between man and man, that where services are rendered at the request of another, he is bound in law to pay a reasonable compensation for those services. That is the ground upon which we ask that these officers shall be compensated for services which they have heretofore rendered.

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman from Tennessee also asked whether the law of 1850 did not actually prohibit registers and receivers from receiving compensation? I answer that the law makes no such prohibition; it is merely silent on the subject, and that was unquestionably an oversight.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What was the intention of the framers of that law is a matter of no importance to me in the discussion of the right now under consideration. The question which I present is, is it right that they should receive this compensation? Sir, I do not belong to that class of men who, in investigating a question of right, stop to count the dollars and cents which will come out of the Treasury. I desire first to ascertain whether it is just, and then the other must follow as a natural and inevitable consequence.

Mr. FULLER. Did not the laborer who came in at the eleventh hour receive as much pay as the one who had labored the whole day?

Mr. CAMPBELL. We are also told that the just and faithful servant, who knew his master's will, and did it, received his just reward.

I desire now to relieve the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] of the objection which he urged to this section of the bill, that the sum to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States is so indefinite that it is impossible to calculate the extent of it. There has been much said upon this question. Some have rated the amount at $500,000, and others at a still more exorbitant rate, without, I think, making any calculations from the correct data which they had in their possession. I have made an estimate, based upon the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; it may not be precisely the sum, but it will vary very little from it, and I will read it for the information of the committee, and particularly of those gentlemen who urge this most special objection to this section of the bill:

Up to November 1, 1851, there was located of Mexican warrants..... 66,618

It is estimated that out of this number there was located before May 17, 1848, and for which no compensation was allowed, say..... 10,000

That is a very reasonable calculation for the amount of warrants that were located during the first year; they were slowly issued and were slowly entered.

Out of the whole number located..... 66,618
The number of 40 acre warrants are, say 5,018

Under the act of May 17, 1848, land officers have received half pay (twenty-five cents each) for locating 40 acre warrants: there would be due for them, therefore, for 40 acre warrants located..... $2,509

There would be due, under the Senate bill for locating ten thousand 160 acre warrants up to

May 17, 1848, for which land officers have received no compensation..... $40,000
There have been located since the passage of the law of May 17, 1848, for which each land officer has received fifty cents each, the following number of warrants, say..... 51,618
There would be due to the officers for locating that number of warrants under Senate bill, say..... $153,854
Add to that sum the balance due for locating 40 acre warrants and 160 acres, for which no compensation has been paid..... 42,509
Of the new issue of warrants under the act of September 28, 1850, there have been located (say) 3,708 warrants. Upon these there has been nothing paid. About one half of this number are 40 acres; one third, 80 acres; one sixth, 160 acres. For locating these warrants of the last issue at the rate of compensation allowed by Senate bill there would be due..... 6,798

Estimated amount to be deducted for those officers where there have been a great many warrants located and large cash entries made, and where the officers have received already the maximum allowed by law, say..... 20,000

Leaving to be paid from the Treasury.. $183,161

These are calculations which I have made, and which any one who will take the trouble to examine the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office will find to be correct, within a very small amount at least, if it varies at all.

Now, this section of the bill proposes to appropriate $183,161 for compensating the public officers who have discharged faithfully their duties to the Government. Is that right, or is it wrong? Is it right when land is entered for money that the Government should pay a percentage on that land? Is it right, for the purpose of securing integrity and competency in those public officers, that they should receive a just compensation—an equal reward for the labor they are called upon to discharge? There seems to be some little doubt as to the reasons which impelled the enactment of this law, or rather which prevented the insertion of a provision in that law that these officers should receive an adequate compensation for their services. Now, I understand the state of the case to be this: The Government of the United States in bestowing the bounty contained in the bill upon those who had served their country as soldiers, in all the wars since the Revolution, viewed it in the light of a gratuity, which was to cost the recipient nothing, and therefore required the land officers to perform the labor of locating free of charge, thereby transferring a duty which belonged to the Government, to the single shoulders of the poor officer, and that, too, without fee or compensation of any kind.

This, in some cases, might be considered a correct principle; but I think in the present case it is a misapplication of the principle, if it be a correct one. It will be observed here, that these public officers receive their compensation from fees alone. Now, in making this assertion it may be answered, that they receive a salary. What is the salary of one of these officers? Why, it is $500 per annum. And is the extent of this salary merely, sufficient to pay their office rent, and their other incidental expenses connected with their office duties? When this system of locating lands by warrants was adopted by the Government, locations were greatly increased, and the labor of the officers, as a matter of course, was greatly increased; at the same time, many of the officers who I know in the State of Illinois, as well as in the States of Iowa and Wisconsin, were compelled to hire additional clerks for the purpose of keeping up the business of their offices. Yet, all they had to pay this clerk hire with was the $500 which they received as salary. And out of that their rent for offices, and all their incidental expenses connected with the business of their offices, was to be paid. Now, is there any principle in political economy, is there any principle in morals, that would sustain a Government like this, in requiring these officers or agents to discharge their laborious duties without giving them a reasonable compensation for their services? Is it right, when land is entered with cash, that these officers shall be paid $2 for each entry out of the Treasury of the United States, but when the Government requires them to perform a greater amount of labor, that it should say to them, "We will not pay you anything; and if you do not like it you may resign?" Magnanimous sentiment! Unanswerable argument! Profound statesmanship! that the Government will not pay these officers for their services, and then say if they are not sufficiently worthy or philanthropic or patriotic to perform the labor without pay, that they can resign. Why, I tell the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] that I apprehend he can find a plenty of men in his own State—nay, in his own district, who would willingly underbid him for the very situation he now occupies. That policy which looks to the lowest price, for which high responsible offices in the country can be filled, is groveling in its aim, unstatesman-like in its economy, and in the end disastrous to the public interest. If you desire to hold your public officers to a strict accountability; if you desire to hold them to a high responsibility, let the Government never adopt the policy of creating necessity, and then hold up before him the most alluring temptations. Why, it is said that many of these officers avail themselves of their situation and of their position, to speculate in these warrants. All that may be true. I do not pretend to deny that there are men who have disregarded their instructions, who have violated the law, and who have made fortunes out of these offices. But is that any reason why a just man, who has discharged faithfully and honestly the duties which the law has imposed upon him, should be made to suffer with the guilty, or that he should receive nothing for the labor which he has performed for his Government?

Mr. BRENTON. I regretted that the time was limited for this discussion to so short a period, not that it was my desire to occupy much of the time of the committee with any remarks I might have to make. Far from it. Nor do I desire to consume a single moment of the present time of the committee on any subject, other than that now under consideration. The proposition in this bill has been correctly stated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] But there are some important facts connected with this measure, which it is important that every member of this committee should be acquainted with, in order to vote understandingly upon its provisions.

I desire to say, as regards the first provision of the Senate bill, I believe there is no division of sentiment here. The House has, by a previous vote, passed almost unanimously upon that proposition, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss it. But it is mainly with reference to the second and third sections that objections have been raised. The ground of that objection will be removed, so far as the second section is concerned, by the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] providing for the location of these land warrants, the person locating them, whether the original warrantee or the assignee of the warrant, shall pay to these officers, for the trouble of locating them, thereby relieving, in all time to come, the Treasury of the nation from any expense whatever upon the subject. But I am aware that it has been contended, and may still be contended by some, that these officers are not entitled to compensation for the location of warrants, notwithstanding that compensation may be paid by the holders themselves. Now, any gentleman, having any practical experience in connection with the operation of our land offices, or who has for a moment informed himself in reference to the amount of labor necessary to be performed in the location of warrants, cannot assume grounds of this character. I speak upon this question from my own knowledge, that the amount of labor necessarily performed by the officers of Government in the location of these warrants, when compared with the labor necessary to dispose of the public domain for cash, is, at least three times as much. And this labor, which the officers are called upon to perform, requires some compensation at your hands, and the question addresses itself to every member of this House; and every member, who will carefully examine the ground of their application, and the nature of their claims, must, upon the principles of strictest equity, grant their request. I need not dwell upon this point, in consequence of the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAMPBELL] obviating the difficulties which have, heretofore, been urged. I know this is a very delicate question, and proposes to withdraw money from the public Treasury, and on which gentlemen, who pause, reflect, and look about them, and like all bills connected with the expenditure of public moneys, require mature consideration. No appropriation should be made, no authority should be given to draw money from the public Treasury, unless there is good ground for so doing, and unless the interest of the country demand that such appropriation should be made. The difficulty, then, being obviated by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] as regards this second section, it is not necessary for me to consume time in directing the attention of the committee to it.

I wish to state that there is certainly a mistake, under which members of the committee are laboring, as regards the true nature of the labor performed, and the true nature of the claim here urged, upon the part of the officers of the Government. And I wish to show the progress made in locating these warrants during the years of 1847, '48, '49, '50, and three quarters of 1851, inclusive; and, at the same time, to exhibit the amount of cash sales during the same period. The Commissioner of the General Land Office shows, as follows:

In 1847 the cash value of warrants located was	$989,850
While the cash sales amounted to	3,296,404
In 1848 the value of warrants located was	2,861,200
While the cash sales amounted to	2,621,615
In 1849 the value of the warrants located was	4,256,900
While the cash sales amounted to	1,756,890
In 1850 the value of warrants located was	3,709,600
While the cash sales amounted to	1,818,829
In three quarters of 1851 the value of warrants located was	1,722,000
The cash sales for the same period was	1,933,119

Total $12,839,550

Of this amount $12,839,550 are for the cash value of Mexican warrants located up to the close of the third quarter of 1851.

Having, myself, been connected with the Land Office for a number of years, when I speak upon the subject, in regard to facts connected with it, I speak from my own personal knowledge.

There have been issued under the act of 1847—up to the 1st of November, 1851—80,781 Mexican warrants of this number 66,618 up to that date.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to two or three additional facts: 1st, Of the whole number located, 33,502, or more than one half of the whole number, were located prior to the close of the third quarter of 1849, and consequently by the former officers; while less than one half, or 33,116, were located by the present officers. 2d, About one fourth of the whole were located prior to the passage of the act of May, 1848, authorizing a charge of twenty-five cents on forty acre warrants, and fifty cents on one hundred and sixty acre warrants, where they were located by assignees.

I might appeal to my Democratic friends, as did the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] and ask them to give their support to this bill, in favor of their Democratic brethren who are now out of office.

Again: there have been already issued up to the 1st of November, 1851, 54,201 warrants under the act of 1850; and this number will be increased during the next year to near 150,000. For the compensation of officers, who are required to locate these, no provision is made.

But, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the question of compensation, I hope I shall be excused if I detain the committee a little longer, in order to notice some of the objections against it. My colleague, who reported the amendment from the select committee, says:

"We provide for the future claims of officers for locating these warrants, that the register and receiver is to receive each fifty cents."

That is the fee which they are now entitled to for locating forty acres of land, at one per cent. upon the money received by each officer. He then says:

"I submit to the House, that there is no more trouble in the location of one hundred and sixty acres, than there is in locating forty acres of land. We, therefore, ought not to pay any more in the one case than the other."

If this is a correct conclusion, then the policy of the Government, in reference to cash sales, is all wrong, and has been. And I submit to the House that there is no more trouble in selling one hundred and sixty acres of land for cash, than there is in selling forty acres. Therefore, according to his argument, you should pay no more in the one case than the other. But has the principle been heretofore recognized by the Government? By no means. Since 1818, the Government has paid for selling forty acres of land, at $1 25 per acre, fifty cents; and for selling one hundred and sixty acres, at the same price, $2. Is not this equitable?

I must now briefly notice some objections urged against paying land officers for services already rendered; but this question has been so fully, forcibly, and ably discussed by other gentlemen, that I do not feel authorized to say much in reference to it.

The justness of this claim has been, to some extent, admitted by my colleague in reference to most of these claimants. He says: "It may be possible that in some of the offices labor has been done for which their fees and salary have not been an adequate compensation." He says further: "If their cases are meritorious, undoubtedly the Congress of the United States will be disposed to grant relief." Now, if it can be shown that all these cases are meritorious, I am confident that my colleague, as a part of the Congress of the United States, will be ready and willing to vote now for this relief and in the form proposed. And in order to secure his vote, I shall undertake to show that they are all meritorious.

Let me, however, notice, before going further, the exception of the gentleman to a few of these claims. He says: "In many of these offices they are not entitled to" this relief. Why? Because "they have in many instances received almost the maximum the law allow them to receive." To this it is sufficient answer to say, that in all such cases the amount to be paid out of the Treasury will of course be trifling.

But now for the meritorious character of these claims: It will be remembered that in the commencement of these remarks I gave an exhibit of the cash sales and the cash value of the warrants which had been located during the past five years, amounting to $24,256,407. Now, sir, if the per cent. on the whole amount had been equally divided among all the officers in the United States, it would have given to each officer only the sum of $713; this, added to their salaries, would have made $1,213 each. But when we deduct the value of the warrants from the actual cash receipts, how does the matter then stand? The value of the warrants was $12,839,550, leaving the cash receipts $11,416,857. The per cent. on this amount, equally divided, would be $335; add to this, their salary, and it gives to each $835. But when we come to look at the actual receipts at the different offices the true state of the case presents itself without disguise.

I shall not trouble the committee with an exhibit of the actual receipts at the different offices for the past five years, but will select 1850 as an average year, the cash receipts being $1,818,829. There are sixty-eight offices in the United States, and the highest commission received at any office was $1,235; the next was $561; while at eight offices they received less than $500; at twelve, $400; at thirteen, $300; at six, $200; and at eighteen, $100—so that the receipts for that year range from $561 down to $20, exclusive of their salary. With this sum they must support themselves, pay their office-rent, and clerk-hire. Will we compel them to do it, and require them at the same time to locate these warrants for nothing?

I did not know that it had entered into the policy of this Government, in fixing the compensation of its officers, to enter into an examination for the purpose of ascertaining what it would cost a man to live. The question is, Shall the services rendered receive a proper equivalent? But I know in the portion of the country where I reside, and where it is probable living can be had as cheap as anywhere else, that no man can get exceedingly rich upon $500 per annum—that no man can get very rich upon $800—that no man can get extremely wealthy who receives annually $1,000, out of which he is compelled to support himself and family. The registers and receivers are compelled to furnish their own clerk-hire, to supply their fuel, and to pay for their office-rent out of the salary they receive. If the Government would meet these contingent expenses, the nature of the case would be changed. It is a matter of impossibility, supposing all their office expenses were defrayed, and their family supplied with bread and meat gratuitously, for them to become rich receiving $500 a year. It is perfectly idle to talk about the vast amount of money these men receive for the services rendered by them from the Government. The day has passed by at most of the places where these offices are located when more than a liberal compensation can be obtained. The lands are being rapidly exhausted in many of the States, and soon these offices will be abolished.

I differ with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] however, in regard to the amount it will take to liquidate these claims out of the Treasury of the United States. I cannot, by any examination I have made, and I have made the most critical examination of the reports from 1847 to the third quarter of 1851—supposing all these warrants were located without receiving anything—make the amount as large as that stated by my friend.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman will permit me just one word. I made this calculation, intending it should cover all the expenses, all the compensation, and put it at the very highest figure. I stated that it might not be positively correct; but I knew it was large enough to cover the entire sum that would be required to be paid out of the Treasury as compensation for these services.

Mr. BRENTON. I am aware the gentleman has placed it at the highest possible amount; but I did not allude to his statement for the purpose of having a controversy upon that question with him or any other gentleman. If he will take the amount of public lands disposed of from the time these warrants were issued up to the present time, fixing their cash value at the minimum price, he can ascertain, to the fraction of a cent, the precise value of all these lands; and then it can be ascertained precisely what amount should be paid to these land officers for the labor they have performed. There is no question more susceptible of demonstration. It is as plain as figures can make it, and each individual, by examining, can be satisfied as to this point.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the gentleman whether he is not aware that for the last year the cash sales at these land offices have increased in a greater ratio than the entry of lands by land warrants?

Mr. BRENTON. I believe I stated in my remarks before that which would answer the gentleman's inquiry. I will say here, that just in proportion as the Mexican warrants have been consumed, the cash sales have increased, and, during the past year, there being but few warrants to be located, and very few issued under the act of 1851, the cash sales naturally would increase. Just as these warrants are diminishing, the cash sales will increase. I am fully aware of this fact, and have stated it before. These officers are necessary to the execution of the law of the United States for the disposition of the public domain; and I ask, upon what principle of justice can any man, or this Government, say to them that these laws shall be faithfully executed, but you shall not receive anything for your labor and trouble, and the necessary expense attending the disposition of the public land? If the gentlemen who represent the Southwestern States will take the pains to examine the receipts of their various offices for the past five years, they will find that many of their officers—their own constituents, have received less than $600 for their services. It has been equally the case in the West. In my own State, during the past year, the compensation at no office reached $1,000. There is, in my mind, an objection to the form of the third section of the Senate bill, which objection was suggested by the remarks of my colleague, the chairman of the select committee. It may be, I suppose, so amended as to meet his views upon the question. I have, therefore, an amendment which I intend proposing to the third section of this bill, in reference to the compensation for the past officers. I intend moving to strike out all previous to the first proviso, and to insert the following provision:

And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and allow the claims of the former and present registers and receivers of the several land offices in the United States, for their services rendered prior to the passage of this act, in locating military bounty land warrants, issued under the acts of Congress approved February 11, 1847, and September 28, 1850; the rates of compensation to be the same as now allowed by law on the sales of public lands for cash, at the minimum price, after deducting the amount they may have received from persons who have located assigned warrants. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the claimants or their legal representatives, the amounts so allowed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. BRENTON yielded the floor to

Mr. CARTER, who moved the committee rise; which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order of the House, being Senate bill 146, entitled "An act to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," and that it had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion by Mr. CARTER,

The House then adjourned.

Also, three petitions of inhabitants of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of measures for the amicable adjustment of international controversies; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the memorial of the widow of Henry Sevely, Captain of the privateer "Nonsuch" during the last war with Great Britain, praying the payment of certain arrearages of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a petition of the inhabitants of Borden-town, New Jersey, praying that the law abolishing flogging in the Navy may not be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Marion county, Illinois, in favor of the enactment of a law granting a reasonable preemption to actual settlers along the line of the Illinois Central Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the memorial of the Commissioners of the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb at Fulton, Missouri, praying a donation of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the memorial of John C. Jones, praying to be allowed the full amount of his claims against Mexico, and not a pro rata allowance of the amount appropriated to satisfy the claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOWNS presented the memorial of a committee, appointed at a meeting of the people of North Louisiana and of Northeastern Texas, praying the right of way and a grant of land to the State of Louisiana, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Mississippi river, in that State, to the Texas line; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of Robert M. Hamilton, United States Consul at Montevideo, praying compensation for diplomatic services; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of citizens of the United States, praying for such alteration of the present tariff as will promote the honest and practical efforts of the importing merchants, the best interests of the farmers, of the manufacturing establishments, and fisheries, and the welfare of the laboring people of all classes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, praying a grant of public land to enable that State to make a geological survey of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

WORKMEN ON THE CAPITOL.

Mr. CASS. I hold in my hand a petition of mechanics and laborers lately employed on the extension of the wings of the Capitol, praying that they may be allowed to proceed with the work. They desire to be employed on the work during the winter, but to wait for their remuneration until an appropriation shall be made for that purpose. I have also a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, and a letter from the principal architect, recommending this course. Very strong reasons are given why this course should be pursued, as well on account of the public interest as from a regard to the condition of these people. I desire that the petition may be read.

The Secretary read it accordingly. The memorialists represent that they came to Washington for the purpose of being employed on the extension of the wings of the United States Capitol, and many of them, relying with confidence on the Government, brought with them their families. They are mechanics and laboring men, upon whom the responsibility of a family depends. They look to Congress alone for relief, by allowing them on their own responsibility to continue at work during the winter, with a view to the future action of Congress.

The letter from the Secretary of the Interior, the Hon. A. H. H. Stuart, and the letter of the Architect, Mr. T. U. Walter, were also read.

Mr. CASS. I hold in my hand a joint resolution in relation to this subject, which I hope the Senate will consider at this time.

Mr. HUNTER. Let it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be and he hereby is authorized to continue in employment so many of the mechanics, laborers, and others employed in the construction of the wings of the Capitol, as may be necessary, provided such persons as may be employed under the authority of this resolution consent to wait for their pay any appropriation which may be hereafter made by Congress for that purpose.

Mr. CASS. I will merely remark, that that resolution was prepared by the Committee on Public Buildings of the other House. A similar one is pending in Committee of the Whole in that House; but it is doubtful when it will come up. They therefore wished me to introduce it in the Senate. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce the resolution at this time, notice not having been given.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not object to the object of the resolution, because I concur with the Senator from Michigan in regard to it; but I would suggest to him whether it would not be better to refer it to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. CASS. I suggested that course, but the chairman of the committee of the other House thought it unnecessary.

Mr. HUNTER. If that is the opinion of the chairman I will not press it.

Mr. CASS. I so understood him. The Senator from Illinois was present, and can bear witness to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was spoken to this morning by the Architect, and also by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings of the other House in regard to the subject. They were extremely anxious that this resolution should be passed this morning; and I hope that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish to say a word why I shall object at this time. If I understand this matter, a committee has been appointed by the other House to investigate the subject, and see whether it is proper that the work should go on at all. Therefore, I think it is improper at this time to pass a resolution requiring the work to be continued.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator from Arkansas is under a misapprehension. There has been no committee appointed by the other House to investigate the subject. It is under the charge of the Committee on Public Buildings, and the chairman of that committee was here this morning and expressed a hope that this resolution would be passed.

The PRESIDENT. It cannot be received as objection has been made. Is any motion made with regard to the memorial?

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the memorial and papers be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPLOSION OF STEAM-BOILERS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am requested to present the memorial of Alfred Guthrie. The memorial is one which treats of the explosion of steam boilers.

I will state its object briefly. This man has devoted about twenty years of his life to this subject. He is a man of a strong, practical, and scientific mind; and he presents a treatise and a scheme by which he hopes to relieve, in some measure, the public from those disasters which are so common. I have examined his scheme, and I confess I have been struck with astonishment at it. It has been submitted also to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis,] and some of the most scientific men in this city. This man does not come forward to ask for any appropriation; but his object is to lay the result of a life of labor, upon this all-important subject, before the public. He has begged me to present this memorial, and also his treatise, which embodies the result of the experiments of a life of one of the most remarkable men perhaps now in our country, so far as this subject is concerned. He has been employed in my own State, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts can bear me witness, that at a time when we hardly knew what to do in relation to our canals, when we depended upon the rivers for a sufficient supply of water, this man, then comparatively unknown, stepped in and proposed that water should be supplied from the lake. At first he was laughed at, but the proposition has been carried out, and has been eminently successful. I hold in my hand his treatise. It has been submitted to the most scientific gentlemen in Washington—Colonel Abert and others—and, as far as I can learn, they pronounce it to be a most remarkable result of a life of labor and experiment in this matter, and as calculated to relieve us, in a great measure, from those disasters which have been of such frequent occurrence in the country. All that I ask, and I hope and trust that it will be granted, is, that the Committee on Printing will direct that this will be printed, and laid on the tables of the Senate, that each Senator may examine it, and afterwards such action may be taken on the subject as may be deemed necessary.

I would remark, though it is not perhaps immediately connected with this subject, what struck me when I heard of its being examined by scientific officers in this city. A remarkable thing, which is related in history, occurred to my mind. When Napoleon was preparing his great expedition at Boulogne—when he was preparing his flotilla for the invasion of England, an American, unknown at the time, called upon him and presented a project by which he could invade England in spite of her fleet. Napoleon himself said that he examined it, and was struck with the project, but he had not time to give it a thorough investigation, and he referred it to the scientific men of France. They pronounced the man crazy, and said he ought to be sent to a mad-house. Yet that man was Fulton, and Napoleon lost the world by neglecting that opportunity. Here is the case of a man who has given a whole life to a subject quite as important as the invasion of England was at that time. I trust that the memorial and treatise will receive consideration and respect. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Printing.

They were so referred.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Guier and McLaughlin, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of R. S. Blair, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the petition of William B. Hart, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Additional documents were also presented by Mr. BELL, and referred to the same committee.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the widow of Marvin W. Fisher, reported a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the select committee to which was referred the bill making a grant of land to the several States of the Union for the relief and support of indigent insane persons, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SOULE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the memorial of William C. Templeton, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to provide for a tri-monthly mail from New Orleans to Vera Cruz, via Tampico, and back, in steam vessels.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

PLANK ROADS—MAIL ROUTES.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the joint resolution to establish certain mail routes, reported it with an amendment, and asked for its immediate consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to its consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUSK. The original resolution referred to the committee was to constitute a plank road in the State of New York a post road; and to enable the Postmaster General to have the mail carried thereon. As the general law now stands, all canals and railroads are post roads, and the Postmaster General has a right to contract for the transportation of the mail thereon. I suppose plank roads would then have been made post roads if any had existed. There is no reason why plank roads should not be post roads. The amendments which the committee propose to the resolution is, to invest the Postmaster General with power to contract, whenever it shall be deemed proper, for the carrying of the mails on plank roads, and to constitute them by law post roads of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to, the resolution was reported to the Senate, the amendment was concurred in, and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

REPORTS OF SURVEYORS GENERAL.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of the Interior, with the reports of the Surveyors General of Illinois, and Missouri, and Oregon, communicated to the Senate the 2d instant, be printed, in connection with the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which accompanied the President's message at the commencement of the session.

Mr. FELCH also submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitted to the Senate with the annual message of the President, together with the reports of the Surveyors General of Illinois, and Missouri, and Oregon, transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior, on the 2d instant, be printed for the use of the General Land Office.

BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

BILL PASSED.

The engrossed bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation therein mentioned, and to confirm the title of Charles G. Gunter thereto, was read a third time and passed.

REPORT OF CAPTAIN H. STANSBURY.

Mr. DOUGLAS submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of Captain H. Stansbury, of his exploration of the Valley of the Great Salt Lake, which was ordered to be printed by a resolution of the Senate of the 12th March last, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that five hundred copies thereof be furnished to the Topographical Bureau, three hundred to the Smithsonian Institution, and two hundred copies to Captain Stansbury.

DIPLOMATIC INTERCOURSE WITH SWITZERLAND.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, a few days since I laid before the Senate a resolution upon the subject of our diplomatic relations with Switzerland, which I desire now to have considered and disposed of.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be requested to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the usual outfit and salary of a chargé d'affaires to Switzerland.

Mr. BRODHEAD. There are many considerations of a political as well as commercial character, which should induce this Government no longer to be neglectful of diplomatic intercourse with the Swiss Republic, or rather with the Government of the Swiss Confederation. It is now the only republic in Europe; and notwithstanding it is surrounded with despotisms, and has often been threatened with an extinguishment of its nationality, it has always resolutely maintained an altar to freedom. It has been a kind of nursery of free principles, and a place where political refugees have always found an asylum. It now has a population of over two millions and a half, with a large and increasing commerce. In 1848 and 1849 they reorganized the Government and adopted a constitution similar in many of its provisions to our own. They adopted a system more national in its character, and now have the same powers to negotiate treaties of amity and commerce that we have,—a power which could not be exercised before without the consent of all the Cantons. All other Governments of any importance have diplomatic representatives in Switzerland—France, England, Austria, Prussia, Russia, Spain, &c., and we, a sister Republic, have none. In diplomatic circles we have no person to represent this Government or defend our institutions or protect our citizens. In the event of a war in Europe it would be peculiarly necessary for us to have a representative in Switzerland, with whom the friends of liberal and republican principles could have communion without fear. A representative from this country would aid in maintaining constitutional government, and be more likely to enjoy confidence in Switzerland than the representative of any other nation, and hence would be enabled to obtain information which would be valuable.

Independent of political inducements, our commercial interests and industrial pursuits, I think, demand the establishment of a permanent mission in Switzerland. The annual amount of international exchange may safely be estimated at ten millions of dollars, and is larger than our commerce with Naples, Sardinia, Denmark, Holland, or Belgium, at all of which places we have diplomatic representatives. Our commercial intercourse with Switzerland is important. She consumes annually from 100,000 to 150,000 bales of our cotton, about 500 hogsheads of our tobacco, and a considerable quantity of rice and other products. We receive in return her silks, laces, finer cotton goods, jewelry and watches. By a provision in the present Swiss constitution, raw materials required by manufacturers, as well as the necessities of life, are admitted at the lowest possible rate of duty. This liberal commercial policy requires some notice and encouragement at our hands. It is well known that efforts have been made to draw her into a commercial league with the Zoll Verein and other powers, on terms injurious to our interests. For these, and other reasons which I might urge, I hope the resolution will be adopted, and that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will give the subject that consideration which I think its importance demands.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROTECTION TO CITIZENS OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, in accordance with previous notice, I now ask leave to introduce a bill providing additional protection to the citizens of California and Oregon, from aggressions by the Indian tribes and from foreign invasion. Recent intelligence from California informs us that there was imminent danger of a general rising of the Indian tribes in the southern section of the State, for the avowed object of plundering and massacring the whites. This portion of the State is sparsely populated; so much so, that it is impossible to collect such bodies of men, at short notice, as are required to keep the Indians in check. Many of the inhabitants of that State at points remote from the coast are at the mercy of the Indians, and have already been attacked, plundered, and forced to fly for their lives. I will only introduce the case of the Hon. Mr. Warner, Senator from the district of San Diego, who, in defending his property from an attack of the Indians, lost one of his men, all of his stock, and was compelled to fly to the town of San Diego for protection; and so imminent was the danger of an attack upon that place, that martial law was proclaimed, and every citizen capable of bearing them was under arms. If there should be a general rising of the Indian tribes in south California, as is still apprehended, (although the intelligence by the last steamer is more favorable for the preservation of peace,) Los Angeles and Santa Barbara will be as much exposed to depredations as San Diego, and the loss of life and the sacrifice of property will be immense. Within this great extent of country, comprising several hundred miles of sea-coast, with an equal extent of back country, we have no governmental protection against these Indian hostilities. There are some troops at San Diego, and a post at the mouth of the Gila, but it is a mockery to say they are any protection to the country. In fact, they can scarcely protect their own scalps from the tomahawk of the Indians; and if we give credit to the intelligence that has reached us, the post at the mouth of the Gila was surrounded for days by hostile Indians, and only saved from massacre by a piece of artillery, that dealt terror, as well as death, among the savages. It is by no means certain that the inadequate force of that station can continue successfully to resist the hostile attacks of the Indian tribes that surround it. Nor can the Government extend adequate protection to the Pacific coast under the existing organization of the army. We must have an entirely new system, adapted to the peculiar situation of the country; and it is to accomplish this purpose that I have prepared the bill that I propose before I take my seat to bring before the Senate. Sir, the citizens of California and Oregon have appealed to their Government for protection, as will appear from the resolutions of the Legislature of California, and the letter of the distinguished Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] both of which I will read:

Joint Resolutions in relation to establishing forts on our borders.

Whereas a large portion of our State is unprotected from the different tribes of Indians that live upon our borders, and that these tribes are frequently engaged, and are now at war with the citizens of this State; and in consequence of our present unprotected condition there is no security for either life or property, and this State not having the means of extending that protection to its citizens which their present necessities require: and whereas it is the duty of the Federal Government to protect its citizens from the incursions of either internal or external enemies; therefore,

Resolved, (the Senate concurring), That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives be requested to use their best efforts to have a portion of the United States troops established on our borders, and also to have a line of forts erected along the same for the purpose of protecting our citizens.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

WASHINGTON CITY, December 12, 1851.

To his Excellency the President of the United States:

SIR: A sense of duty prompts me to call your early attention to the peculiar condition of things in Oregon. I have been a citizen of that Territory for near three years, have traveled the settled portion of it all over; had much to do with the Indians, and know them, perhaps, as well as any other man, and understand the wants of the American citizens there, and can say to you, that for their protection and for the protection of others emigrating there, that troops to be garrisoned on the great road from St. Joseph via Fort Hall to the Dalles of the Columbia, and also on the road from Oregon to California, are absolutely indispensable for the protection of life and property. I know that I need but call your attention to the condition of things there, and present the facts within my knowledge, to secure your aid and prompt action in the premises. The suffering this season for the want of troops to protect emigrants and others en route to Oregon, and from Oregon to California, has been terrible, and certainly this Government ought, and will, I have no doubt, afford protection to her citizens in a country so remote and exposed as are all persons traveling either on the emigrant road to Oregon or on the road from Oregon to California. There are but these two roads south of the Columbia on which troubles are to be apprehended. The shape of the country, with its stupendous mountains, are insurmountable barriers to the location of roads of importance. A garrison of two or three companies of horse—one of infantry, if a mounted force cannot be had—on each of these roads, at the grand round for instance, on the emigrant or northern road, and in the Rogue River Valley, on the California or southern road. The moral influence that the establishment of the posts would produce upon the minds of the Indians would do much towards keeping peace with them, and afford the protection to American citizens that they are so justly entitled to.

It may be well here to mention, that the road from Oregon to California forks in the Rogue River Valley; the main road passes south of the great Shasti Mountain to the source of the Sacramento, thence down that river to its great valley, and to Sacramento City; the north branch passes by Clamath Lake to Fort Hall. A small party of emigrants have gone that route this season and got in safely. This route was opened by Jesse Applegate Scott and others, in the year 1846, for the purpose of affording to emigrants a pass into the southern portion of Oregon; but such was the suffering of the first emigrants on this route that it has been but little traveled since, but will, I have no doubt, be much traveled if a garrison should be established in Rogue River Valley, as above suggested.

I have been thus explicit in order that you may understand the condition and wants of the country which I have the honor to represent, with the full belief that you will take such steps as may be necessary to give protection to the citizens there, and emigrants and others traveling to and from Oregon.

Herewith I inclose two communications from Oregon for your perusal, which you will please return to me. One of the writers I am well acquainted with, (Mr. Applegate, one of the early settlers of Oregon.) He has done much to bring the country into requisition, by exploring, opening roads, &c., &c.; a sensible, reliable man. With Mr. Simons I have no acquaintance, but have no doubt of the truth of his narrative.

With great respect I am, sir, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH LANE.

What is the response? It will be found in the letter addressed to me by the Secretary of War, which these documents called forth:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, }
December 27, 1851. }

SIR: I have received a copy of the joint resolutions of the Legislature of California, instructing her Senators and requesting her Representatives to use their best efforts to have a portion of the United States troops established on her borders, and also to have a line of forts erected along the same for the purpose of protecting her citizens.

By referring to my annual report (a copy of which is herewith inclosed) you will perceive that I therein allude to the defenceless state of California and Oregon, and the President in his annual message also invites the attention of Congress to the same subject. The military force now at the disposal of the Department will not permit it to increase the number of troops on the Pacific except by filling up the companies already stationed there to their complement, which will shortly be done.

I herewith inclose the copy of a letter recently addressed to the President, by the late Governor of Oregon, on the same subject.

As regards the establishment of forts,—wherever troops are stationed, such works as may be required for their protection and accommodation will, of course, be constructed, but it would be worse than useless to construct them until they can be garrisoned.

I will add that General Hitchcock (who now commands the Pacific division) has been directed to take early and prompt measures, as far as the means at his disposal will enable him to do so, to establish forts at such points on the borders of California and Oregon where they are most needed for the protection of the inhabitants and of emigrant parties.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. M. CONRAD, Secretary of War.
Hon. Wm. M. GWIN, United States Senate.

Sir, here is an honest confession of the inability of the Department to afford us adequate protection under existing laws, and the Secretary deserves credit for it, and equal credit is due to him for the suggestions made in his annual report, from which I will also read extracts:

"In the first place, I would suggest that every facility and encouragement should be afforded to the formation of a local militia, in which our new possessions, like all the Mexican States, are very deficient. As the first step towards the accomplishment of this object, I would recommend that the Executive be authorized to distribute arms among the inhabitants. I am fully persuaded that the advantages that would result from the adoption of this measure, in familiarizing the people with the use of arms, in inspiring them with confidence, and in encouraging the formation of militia companies, would more than compensate for the trifling expense that would attend it. The very fact that the inhabitants were known to be armed, would tend to intimidate the Indians. The distribution should, of course, be made with such precautions as would prevent their being sold or converted to an improper use.

"The quantity of arms to which the new States and Territories are respectively entitled under the act of 1808 is so small as to be of no practical advantage, and, as they have not participated in the issues heretofore made, it would seem to be but just that they should now receive more than their distributive share. At all events they might be permitted to receive their quota for several years in advance. As the arms are lying idle in the depôts, no loss to the Government would result from this course, and they will probably be never more needed than they are at present.

"In the next place, policy and humanity both require that we should employ some other means of putting a stop to these depredations than the terror of our arms. We should try the effect of conciliatory measures. There is no doubt that the Indians are frequently impelled to commit depredations by despair and hunger. As the white population has advanced upon them, they have been compelled to recede before it. The lands that afford nourishment to cattle and game are also the best adapted to cultivation, and consequently the first to tempt the settler; so that the Indians are compelled to take refuge in arid plains and mountains that afford little sustenance to animal life; and even there the circle of white population seems rapidly closing around them."

"I would also recommend that measures be taken to furnish, for a series of years, food and other necessities to such Indians as will abandon their predatory habits and cultivate the soil. A authentic information, recently received at this Department, leads to the belief that these tribes are far less numerous than they are generally supposed to be, and I have no doubt (laying aside considerations of humanity) that it would be far less expensive to feed than to fight them."

I will not detain the Senate longer in giving the reasons that have induced me to bring forward this bill. It is in part based upon the report of the Secretary of War, and from my own personal observations of the wants of the people of my State. We must be protected by this Government from the enormous expenses of Indian wars within our limits. Already we have an Indian war debt of nearly a million dollars, for which our people will be taxed, unless Congress make provision for its payment, and if we are to judge from the past, we cannot anticipate immediate relief. We have in our State the picked men of the nation, and they only wish the Government to call for their services, and pay for them, to be ready at a moment's warning to march to the utmost extent of our limits to protect its citizens from Indian depredations. Give us arms, and pay us for our services when you need them, and we will protect ourselves from a foreign or domestic foe.

I do not wish to be understood as proposing to dispense with the services of the army on our coast, nor to advance the opinion that we do not ask for the most ample preparations against the approach of a foreign enemy, for which we should have an extensive system of fortifications and naval defence. We need the army to man our forts and to form the nucleus around which the force this bill proposes to call into the field could rally when an emergency required their services. Without going into the subject further at present, I propose that the bill be printed, and read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The provisions of the bill are as follows:

A Bill to provide for the better protection of the people of California and Oregon.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the State of California or the Territory of Oregon shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, by any foreign nation, or when hostilities shall be threatened or commenced by any Indian tribe, in or adjacent to said State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the commanding general or officer in command of the United States military forces on the Pacific coast, to make a requisition upon the Governors of said State and Territory, or either of them, for volunteers, or to call forth such number of the militia of the State and Territory aforesaid as he may judge necessary, to repel such invasion or to suppress such hostilities, who shall serve for a time specified by the commanding general, or officer in command, provided such term of service does not exceed — months.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers or militia shall be commanded by officers elected or appointed, or to be elected or appointed, in the manner prescribed by the law of the State or Territory in which they reside, and shall be received in companies, battalions, squadrons or regiments, and when so received and mustered into the service of the United States, shall be armed at the expense of the United States, and shall be subject to the rules and articles of war.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers or militia, during the time they may be in service, shall receive the usual rations of the Army of the United States, and pay equal to three times the amount now provided by law for the pay of the officers and soldiers, respectively, of the United States army on the Pacific coast.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers or militia who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of the provisions of this act, and who shall be wounded, or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred on wounded persons belonging to the Army of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be required to place at the disposal of the Governors of California and Oregon, fifty thousand stand of arms, to be distributed ratably to the citizens of said State and Territory, under such restrictions as to insure their safe keeping and return when required.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall place at the disposal of the Governors of said State and Territory such number of mountain howitzers as may be deemed sufficient to meet the exigencies of the public service, in the event of an Indian war; also, a field battery or "field batteries" of light artillery, of the usual composition; also, a park of flying artillery in the event of a foreign war.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War forthwith cause to be established on the Pacific coast, at such point or points as may be deemed most advisable, an arsenal and magazine, well supplied with powder, shot and shells, for the use of this military in the event of a foreign or Indian war; also, to place in depot, in the neighborhood of San Diego and San Francisco, one hundred sea-coast guns of suitable calibres, to defend the entrance to those harbors: those guns to be mounted in open batteries, should the emergency of a foreign war arise before permanent fortifications shall be constructed to receive them.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall be convicted of disposing of any of the public arms or munition herein provided for the public service of the aforesaid State and Territory, to any Indian or Indian tribe, shall be subject to a penalty of — dollars, and imprisonment for a period of not less than six, nor more than — months.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TENURE OF ARMY APPOINTMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. HALE the 3d instant, in relation to the tenure of appointments in the Army, and the resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that all commissions in the Army of the United States shall be for a limited time, which shall be expressed in the commission.

IRISH EXILED PATRIOTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates; and,

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and be the order of the day for Saturday, the 7th instant.

PRINTING THE SEVENTH CENSUS.

On the motion of Mr. GWIN, the Senate resumed the consideration of the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for printing the census returns, upon such terms as the committee may deem reasonable.

Which Mr. SMITH had moved to amend by substituting the following:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, in conformity with the provision of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1842,' approved on the 18th May of said year, to contract for the composition and press-work of — copies of the returns of the Seventh Census, as the same are classified and arranged by said Secretary, and in like manner to contract for so much paper and of such quality as he shall deem proper for said work; and in like manner to contract for binding said returns as printed in such style as he may judge expedient; provided the party to each of said contracts shall give such surety, and said paper and work shall be subject to such inspection, as said Secretary shall require to insure a faithful performance of the same."

The PRESIDENT. Since the resolution was under consideration, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] has moved an amendment to the amendment. It is to strike out all after the words "it shall be the duty of," and insert the following:

"The Joint Committee on Printing to contract with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong for printing and binding the Census, on such terms as the committee may think reasonable and proper: the work to be executed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and to be paid for from time to time, during the progress of the work, by the head of the Census Bureau, under the direction of the Secretary, with power in the Secretary to abate from the amount stipulated if the work, when executed, shall prove deficient or below the standard which may be agreed upon."

Mr. PEARCE. Before the question is taken on that amendment, I desire to submit an amendment. If the Senate is disposed to depart from the former practice of letting out the printing on contract, and to leave the matter to the discretion of a committee, it seems to me that it would be proper to have some limitation to which the committee should go. I think that their discretion ought to be guided by some rule, to be prescribed by the Senate; and I know of nothing which requires limitation so much as this matter of public printing. I propose, therefore, to limit the power of the committee by an amendment which I offer to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland is not in order. The question is on an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] to an amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. PEARCE. I was not aware of that. I will ask, then, that my amendment may be read for the information of the Senate, and, if occasion should require it, I will offer it at the proper time.

The amendment was read, as follows:

"Provided, That the prices to be allowed for the execution of the work shall in no case exceed the average rate of the proposals of the several bidders for the printing of the Thirty-second Congress for the respective classes, or for any class of printing to be executed under this resolution."

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH. I very much regret that I cannot accede to the proposition which is submitted by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] upon the idea of a compromise.

So far from being any compromise of the differences that have been expressed here between different members of the Senate, I regard it as a great deal worse than the original resolution; and I prefer voting, most decidedly, for the original resolution to giving my assent to the amendment which has been proposed by my honorable friend from North Carolina. In the first place, Mr. President, I have to say, that if the resolution shall be amended as is proposed by my honorable friend, it will be open to every one of the objections which I urged against the original resolution, and it is open to some other objections which cannot be urged against the original resolution.

I am not about to consume the time of the Senate by reiterating the objections which I made at some length, and which have been put into print, and, I dare say, have attracted the notice of the honorable members of this body, so far as they might be deemed worthy of notice. But one of the principal objections I recur to here, is, that as the resolution originally stood, and as the matter is to be presented by the amendment of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, it is totally impossible for the Committee on Printing to make any safe, judicious, and proper contract on the subject, for the reason that the Senator does not propose in his amendment to determine what number of copies of this work is to be printed. But I think it is a little remarkable that the Senator, in drawing up this amendment, should not have turned his attention to the difficulties and embarrassments in which the committee will be involved in being required to make a contract with Donelson & Armstrong for printing the census returns, while the committee are not to know how many copies of the work are to be ordered by the two Houses of Congress.

I shall content myself, sir, with stating this objection in these very brief terms. I shall not now repeat what I said in opposition to the original resolution, and which is equally applicable to this amendment, to wit, that this not being Congressional printing, it is, in my judgment, a usurpation of power on the part of Congress. This is one branch of the alternative which I present to the Senate; and the other is, that if it is Congressional printing, it comes within the contract of A. Boyd Hamilton, and will be an infraction of that contract. But, as I have already remarked, I am not about to indulge myself in a reiteration of the considerations which I have heretofore presented, and which seem to have produced very little effect on the mind of the Senator from North Carolina, and which, perhaps, are not worthy of much consideration. But I have to say that this amendment is obnoxious to objections which did not obtain, so far as the original resolution is concerned. The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] whose absence from his seat by reason of indisposition I certainly very much regret, was content with handing over to Donelson & Armstrong the printing of the census returns. He was content with giving them whatever profits they might make by supplying the paper and by executing the composition and press-work, the effect of which, as I remarked the other day, unless the Committee on Printing are remarkably astute in making the contract, will be to hand over to the proprietors of this press, as I verily believe, a very large amount of the public money. The honorable Senator from Indiana was content to deliver over into the hands of these gentlemen whatever profits they might make out of the composition and press-work, but the honorable Senator from North Carolina is not content with that margin of profits. He seems to have the same anxiety about the prosperity of this "Union" office that my honorable friend from Indiana had, as I humbly conceive, when he offered this proposition to the consideration of the Senate. He is not content that these gentlemen shall make all they possibly can out of the composition and press-work, but he proposes to hand over to them also the binding of this work. They are not practical printers; they are the proprietors of a political press in this city. They have no bindery. But the Senator from North Carolina says by his amendment, "I want to have them receive a larger margin of profits, and therefore I want to hand over the binding to them, and they may job it out to the proprietors of the different bindery establishments in this city, and thus make a larger profit." That we know will be the effect of the operation.

Now, why should the binding of these documents be given to Donelson & Armstrong? Why should it not be handed over to the Secretary of the Interior, to be contracted for in conformity with the provisions of the law of 1842? Or, if it is not let out to the lowest bidder, why not hand over the returns to the Committee on Printing, and let them make a contract for the binding with the different proprietors of binding establishments, of which there is a considerable number in this city? We of the Committee on Printing have had a little experience in making contracts with binding establishments in the city of Washington. We made a contract but a short time since, and, I believe, a very prudent and judicious contract too. It has been my good fortune to concur most fully, and on all occasions, with the views and opinions of my honorable friends constituting a majority of that committee.

But the honorable Senator from North Carolina says: I want to hand over to the "Union" office the binding of these documents, and place them in a condition that they can job it out and extort from the hard-working mechanics and artisans of this city, who are engaged in this branch of industry; to give them an opportunity to extort a percentage from them. And we know they will do it. Sir, I will never consent to any such scheme as this. As I have already remarked, the two Houses of Congress have had some experience upon this subject. At the last Congress we made a contract for the execution of the public printing, mainly with Messrs. Belt & Trenholm, and with these same gentlemen we made a contract for the execution of the binding of the two Houses of Congress, although they were not practical bookbinders, and although they had no bindery. And what did they do? They underlet the binding to be done by others, and as I have been credibly informed, they extorted a profit from the workmen engaged in that business of some seven or eight thousand dollars. That is what will be done again, if this scheme of the honorable Senator from North Carolina is adopted.

Sir, I will not dwell upon this subject further. Whatever the majority of this honorable body may do with regard to the printing of this work, I have not the slightest apprehension they are about to yield their assent to the proposition to hand over to the proprietors of the "Union" the binding of this work, which will certainly amount to a very large sum of money.

But there is another objection, Mr. President, to this amendment. It provides that the Joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for the printing and binding of the returns of the census, on such terms as the committee may think reasonable and proper. Then come some other provisions—namely, that the work shall be executed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and be paid for from time to time, during its progress, by the head of the Census Bureau, under the direction of the Secretary, with power in the Secretary to abate from the amount stipulated, if the work, when executed, shall prove deficient, or below the standard which may be agreed upon.

In the first place, then, with regard to these clauses or provisions of the amendment of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, I have to say that they are totally unnecessary. Does the honorable Senator suppose, that if the Committee on Printing be directed to make this contract, the members of that committee will not insert in the contract proper stipulations and guarantees for the due performance of the work? The amendment really recurs to a matter which appertains exclusively to the duties of the committee. You know well enough, sir, that in making the contract in regard to the binding, we inserted in it—as we should insert in every other contract which the Senate may direct us to make—stipulations and guarantees, in order to insure a due compliance with the terms of the contract. Now I am not prepared to say, that these are the proper stipulations, or the proper guarantees. I am not prepared to say, that they are by any means the best stipulations and guarantees that can be made. What stipulations we should insert, what guarantees we should require, is, in my humble judgment, a matter which should come before the committee, and be inserted in the contract itself, and not in any resolution which this honorable body may pass.

But, Mr. President, in addition to other objections, I regard this part of the amendment as an indignity to the honorable Secretary of the Interior. I do not suppose for a moment, nor would I wish to be understood as intimating the idea that it was at all intended by the mover; but suppose that this amendment should be adopted and that the resolution should pass the two Houses of Congress, in conformity with the provisions of this amendment: I desire to inquire of the Senate what sort of exhibition do we make of this subject upon the records of the Government? Do we not commence by saying that we have no confidence in the Secretary of the Interior? Do we not say that we cannot confide to him the power of making this contract? And, having said that, having said that we cannot trust the Secretary of the Interior with the power of making this contract, the honorable Senator proposes that we should take it into our own hands, and that, when we come to the performance of it, we should further say, "we will let you see if there is any failure in the execution of the contract in conformity with the stipulations." Sir, I think this is a poor compliment to the Secretary of the Interior, to come from any side of this Chamber. But I desire to propound for the consideration of my friend, the old inquiry: I wish to know what sort of printing this is? Is it Congressional printing, or is it departmental printing? I insisted the other day that it was departmental printing; and if so, why is Congress making any contract about it? If, on the other hand, it is Congressional printing, why do we call on the Secretary of the Interior to interfere in the matter? At one moment the honorable Senator from North Carolina assumes that it is Congressional printing, and therefore he proposes that the contract shall be negotiated, drawn up, and entered into by the standing Committees on Printing of both Houses of Congress. But, after we have drawn the contract, if it is Congressional printing, why not call upon A. B. Hamilton to execute the contract? But the honorable Senator being perfectly aware that this could hardly be regarded as Congressional printing, and after having said, as he proposes that we should say here, that the Secretary of the Interior should not be intrusted with the negotiation of the contract, he then proposes to put its execution into his hands with large powers—the power of abating from the price if there is not an exact conformity with the stipulations of the contract. Now I object to this in toto. I object to it not only as an indignity to the Secretary of the Interior, but also on the ground that, if we take this business into our hands at all, we should go through with the work; and I am for seeing to the execution of the work; I am for attending to the performance of our own contract; I am for investing the Committee on Printing with the power of deciding whether or not there is a conformity to the terms of the contract. I object, however, in toto to having this thing partly in the hands of the committee of the two Houses of Congress, and partly in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. I cannot, therefore, agree to any such proposition as this, nor shall I agree to it, because the honorable mover has seen fit to baptize it with the name of "compromise." It is no compromise at all. It is rather an exaggeration of the original proposition. I have to say to the Senate, however, that I am a compromise man on all subjects; and I do no mean to exhibit myself here as an extremist. Should my amendment be rejected by a majority of this body, I am prepared to submit a real compromise, which shall be something better, and which shall be truly an intermediate proposition. I have drawn up an amendment, which I hope will meet with the approbation of honorable Senators, constituting the majority of this body, to put this business on a fair and liberal footing—to give, in fact, to Donelson & Armstrong the privilege of executing this work; but, at the same time, providing adequate securities for the public interest; to prevent, in other words, a most enormous expenditure of the public money, and the acquisition of enormous profits by the gentlemen whose names are introduced in this resolution; and I ask the attention of the Senate to it, so that Senators may have an opportunity of comparing the views which I express here, in regard to an intermediate proposition, with the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. This is the amendment I propose:

That the Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for the composition and press-work of—number of copies of the returns of the Seventh Census, as the same are classified and arranged by the Secretary of the Interior, on such terms as they may judge to be reasonable; and that said Secretary be directed to contract with the lowest bidder, in conformity with the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1842," approved on the 18th day of May, in the said year, for so much paper of such quality as he shall judge proper for the said work; and, in like manner, to contract for the binding of the said returns as printed in such style as he may deem expedient; provided that the parties to each of the said contracts shall give sufficient security for the due performance of the same; and such paper as delivered, and such work as executed shall be subject to the superintendence and inspection of the said Secretary, or such person as he may appoint.

Now here I propose that the Committee on Printing—though I do not admit that this is proper to be done by any means, for I do not admit that this is a branch of printing that is in any sense within the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress—but if the Senate, by a majority, shall reject my proposition, I shall assume that it is the sense of the Senate, as they have the power, and that it is proper for them, to direct the Committee on Printing to enter into this contract; and, yielding as I do with great cheerfulness to the opinion of the majority in this body, I then shall propose that the two Houses of Congress give to Donelson & Armstrong the composition and press-work. That is a branch which pertains to their business. They are engaged in printing. Let them have the composition and press-work, and I propose then that we shall furnish our own paper and do our own binding. And how shall we furnish our own paper and do our own binding? Not by authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to let it out to some favorite, or to purchase the paper of some favorite at an extravagant price; but procure it, as all other paper is procured, from the lowest bidder, and let out the binding to the lowest bidder. Well, then, I desire to inquire of the Senate whether this is not all that Donelson & Armstrong, and all their friends, ought to ask? I propose that we shall give them a large job, to wit, the execution of the composition and press-work; and I propose that we shall furnish our own paper; or, in other words, I am unwilling that Donelson & Armstrong shall make a large profit on the paper. Why should we squander the public money by paying them a large profit on the paper? But if we separate the composition and press-work from the supply of the paper, as I propose in this amendment to do, then the Government will obtain the paper at wholesale prices, and there will be no loss to the Government under the head of paper.

But if we make a contract in the manner proposed in the original resolution, and in the manner proposed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina in his amendment, that Donelson & Armstrong shall do the press-work and furnish the paper, I say they will make enormous, or at least very large profits. I do not say they will cheat the Government, but they will do as other men do who mean to be upright and honest. They will purchase the paper at a lower rate than is contemplated, undoubtedly, by the committee, and will make a considerable percentage on the mere paper. But have we any assurance that the paper will not be inferior to the standard? That has been our experience on that subject; and have we not reason to suppose that a profit will be made by the inferiority of the paper? Sir, it is inevitable; it ever has been, and it ever will be so.

I propose, then, that Government shall furnish the paper, and that it shall execute the binding of this work, by letting it out to the lowest bidder; and to let out by contract the mere composition and press-work to Donelson & Armstrong. Now, I have to say that this is a real compromise, not like the handle of a jug, all on one side; it is an intermediate proposition, not a more extravagant proposition, as I insist that the amendment of the honorable Senator from North Carolina is, than the original resolution. It is an intermediate proposition; and I must acknowledge, Mr. President, that I am anxious to introduce into the public service this rule of furnishing our own paper. I would furnish it for the Departments and for Congress, and this would relieve us, in a great degree, from the difficulties and embarrassments in which we have been involved.

Now, I have no feelings on this subject whatever. I shall content myself with doing what I conceive to be my duty. The Senate having been pleased to assign me a situation on the Committee on Printing, I have been constrained to come before the Senate in relation to this subject. I regret to differ from other honorable members of this body, but I have expressed my honest convictions in this regard. I believe my original amendment is right, and I humbly conceive it ought to be adopted by a majority of this honorable body. However, if the judgment of the majority be otherwise, and if that amendment be rejected, then I will come before the Senate with this compromise proposition; and I believe there are moderate members enough in this honorable body who do not desire any arrangement to be made with Donelson & Armstrong except what is a reasonable arrangement; who do not desire to hand over to them an enormous amount of profits in this manner. I trust and believe there are honorable members enough to be found in this body who will yield their assent to the intermediate measure which I now propose. And I have to say further, that if it should assume the form which I have indicated, although I believe it is wrong in principle and bad in practice, yet I believe the result of it will be such that the people of the country will have no occasion of complaint. I believe there will be no very great amount of the public treasure squandered upon these gentlemen, who, I doubt not, are very deservedly and very properly the favorites of a majority of this honorable body.

With these remarks, I yield the subject to the hands of the Senate, prepared to acquiesce in any result to which the Senate may come.

Mr. BADGER. I had not the slightest expectation that the amendment which I offered would, for a moment, command the assent and meet the approbation of the Senator from Connecticut. I had no wild and visionary ideas that that Senator would be satisfied with anything which he did not himself propose. I confess I did have some faint hope that he would have departed from his usual practice of lashing himself into a rage upon any exhibition in this body of an opinion different from that entertained by himself. The hope was faint; still it existed. But, in that I have been unhappily disappointed.

The Senator concluded by a declaration that he has no feeling on this subject. How are we to judge whether he has or not? Are all the external exhibitions of heat, and animation, and force, and insinuation, put on? Would the Senator have us understand that it was all acting, and that, while he seems to be in a towering passion at the expectation of some ruthless violence, some atrocious fraud, some deep and large plundering of the public Treasury, which are likely to be perpetrated on the country, he is all the time perfectly cool, and feels nothing of what he exhibits in manner and expresses in language?

The honorable Senator speaks of oppression and extortion, and yet he is perfectly cool. What is there in the character of Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong that entitles him to talk about "oppression and extortion?" If the Senator means what he said, how is that consistent with his subsequent declaration that he meant no impeachment upon their character, and that he supposed them to be worthy and good men? If the latter declaration be sincere, how can he justify himself in accusing men, whom he admits to be upright, of intended oppression and extortion?

But further: the honorable Senator seems to be stimulated to almost a fury against myself; and having, the other day, very strongly intimated that the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] who introduced the original resolution, had some secret purpose to be engaged in plundering the Treasury, he now intimates that I am disposed to go even further than that honorable and absent Senator. Mr. President, I am, myself, generally in the habit of supposing that I am operated upon by honest motives in what I do. What I propose, I avow. And feeling conscious of such a principle and motive of action in myself, I am not ordinarily in the habit of supposing that those who differ from me must therefore necessarily be influenced by bad motives, or must act through dishonest and insidious purposes and ends. After having made these remarks, let me ask the attention of the Senate for a moment to see what it is that has stirred up this "tempest in a tea-pot," on this occasion.

The honorable Senator says that he objects to my proposed amendment to his, in the first place, because it will place the committee under great embarrassments in making the contract. Why? Because it does not specify the number of copies to be printed. I have been a shorter period of time in public life than the honorable Senator, although I trust I have rather cooled down and restrained the passions of my nature, and used my brief experience to a more profitable extent than the Senator from Connecticut; but I supposed that he would understand that I meant to do one thing at a time. The first object with me, is to ascertain whether the plan which my amendment proposes, for the execution of this public printing, meets the approbation of the Senate. If it does not, why cumber it with a clause about the number of copies to be printed? If the Senate are not disposed to print on that plan at all, it is idle to talk about the number of copies. When we shall have ascertained that the Senate will adopt my proposed plan of printing, I shall be prepared to relieve my honorable friend of the Committee on Printing from the dreadful embarrassments to which he supposes the committee will be subjected.

In the next place, the honorable Senator says he objects to my amendment, because it offers an indignity to the Secretary of the Interior. He very charitably supposes that perhaps I did not mean any indignity; that my heart was right, but that I had not understanding to perceive that I was offering an insult to that gentleman. I beg to assure the Senator, that I not only consider myself incapable of offering an insult to anybody who comes before this Senate—not only to the Secretary of the Interior, but to the carriers on of a public printing establishment, or bindery, or anything else—for I hope the principle by which I am regulated is to treat men, in all classes of society, with proper respect and decorum. I am not only as incapable as the Senator of offering an insult and an affront to a gentleman whom I esteem, but I think myself as capable to distinguish when language does import an affront. What is the affront which the honorable Senator says I have ventured, because I do not know the effect and purport of the language I have used in this amendment, to offer to the Secretary of the Interior? It is, that I propose to give to him an absolute control, without appeal, upon the fidelity with which this work is to be executed; that I have such an entire confidence in him, such a reliance upon his fairness, intelligence, and honor, that I am willing to submit to him to say, without constituting any tribunal of appeal from him, whether these contractors shall have executed the work according to the agreement, and by his mere word to strike down the compensation agreed to be allowed them, to any extent he pleases. Is that an indignity? Does it imply any disrespect to the honorable Secretary? I imagine the honorable Senator is the only man in this Chamber, or in the world, who could suppose so.

Let us trace this matter upon the point of indignity a little. What does the honorable Senator himself propose? What is the existing law with regard to the departmental printing? Does it give any discretion to the head of a Department? Is he not required to advertise for whatever printing and supplies he needs in his office? Is he not absolutely compelled to give it to the lowest bidder? The only trust reposed in him is, that he will be able to tell that $650 is less than $675. My amendment proposes not to put him in that degrading position. I say that it is a degrading position, and I would willingly, if I could, abolish the whole system. But the amendment proposes that the committee of Congress shall make this contract; and when the contract is made, we trust to the intelligence, fairness, and fidelity of the Secretary of the Interior to see that it is faithfully executed. Where is the inconsistency of this? The honorable Senator says, that if this be Congressional printing, we are violating our contract with the persons who have stipulated to do the work for the two Houses of Congress. I admit it is not Congressional printing. It does not come within the terms of the contract for doing the Congressional printing. No man supposes it does.

Then, in the next place, the honorable Senator says it is departmental printing, and therefore it is usurpation for the legislative body of this country to undertake to direct the manner in which the contract should be made and executed. Can he inform me by what part of the Constitution it is, that the heads of the Departments acquire jurisdiction and control over the putting out of contracts for printing? Is that one of the Executive powers of the Government? Is it the notion of the honorable Senator, that it is vested in the head of the Department, and if we undertake to pass a law by which its destination is changed, we are violating the constitutional rights of the Executive? Surely, no man can suppose this. All the authority that the heads of the Departments have over this subject, is derived from acts of Congress. We conferred the power, such as it is, and we have a right to take it back in whole or in part. We have a right to provide, that all the printing for the Departments shall be done under the direction of committees of our own body. The whole subject is one absolutely under the jurisdiction of Congress. I do not mean that it would be decent or becoming for Congress to do so. I do not mean that I would agree to do it. But permit me to say, that when the Senator uses the word "usurpation," he uses language, in relation to this subject, that has no meaning.

The honorable Senator says that his amendment is the best that can be proposed. No doubt he thinks so. I am not quite prepared to say that of my amendment. But I think it is a pretty good one. I think it is a respectable amendment. I think it might have been discussed in this Chamber without any exhibition of warmth and excitement. It relates to a business transaction. I suppose we all have a right to use our judgment about the best manner of doing the business. What is the Senator's proposition? He says he has another amendment. Aye, sir, reject his present amendment, and he has one that he says will be the very thing, upon the principle of compromise; and he says the people of the United States will not have any reason to complain of it, although he admits it is wrong in principle and bad in practice. That is a curious way of commending a matter of compromise to the consideration of the Senate. The people of the United States will have no right to complain of an amendment, which he himself admits to be wrong in principle and bad in practice! If they cannot complain of that, I pray you, sir, of what can they complain? Permit me to say further, that when the Senator commends an amendment to the consideration of this body, admitting that it is wrong in principle and bad in practice, and yet says the people of the United States, whose money is to be used in carrying out and executing its purpose, have no right to complain, he estops himself from offering any complaint against amendments offered by any other Senator. If I thought the amendment which I have had the honor to propose was wrong in principle, or would prove bad in practice, I would certainly instantly withdraw it. But I believe neither.

What does the Senator propose? Why, says he, we will give Donelson & Armstrong the printing and press-work; we will make a bargain, and trust them to do that; but upon what pretense do you give them the binding? He says they are not binders. He says, also, they are not practical printers; so that if the fact that they are not binders furnishes a sufficient reason why they should not have the binding, the fact that they are not practical printers ought to prevent them having the printing. But my friend does not aver that. He says that if they get the binding, they will give it out and exercise oppression and extortion upon mechanics—practical binders. I have already remarked, as far as I thought necessary, upon the use of language of that kind in this Chamber when applied to persons convicted of no infamous crime, and who are, therefore, entitled to be considered as decently honest, "indifferently honest," as old Jack Falstaff used to say. But the honorable Senator ought to have furnished himself with the facts in the case, before he passed such a decided and dogmatic judgment. I suppose he is not aware that Donelson & Armstrong have one of the most extensive binderies in the United States, and one of the most accomplished practical binders in the United States. They are, therefore, as much prepared to do the binding as the printing. They do not mean to do either with their own hands; but they have employees under their control competent to do both.

Then there is a difficulty with regard to the paper. The Senator says, upon this plan, it is certain, it is inevitable that the Government will be cheated in the quality of the paper; but upon his plan the Government will be sure not to be cheated. Let us see. Suppose these men have made a contract; they have furnished a sample of the paper. I should be glad to be informed how it necessarily follows that they must cheat the Secretary of the Interior, and that he cannot determine whether the paper corresponds with the sample. He is to decide if the paper corresponds with the sample. He has entire jurisdiction over the subject. We must order paper to be obtained somewhere. Somebody or other, some human being—we cannot invoke superhuman assistance on this subject—must be called upon to determine whether the paper furnished corresponds with the sample. Who is to do it? Shall it be done by the Committee on Printing? I have the highest respect for every member of that committee; but I cannot attribute infallibility to them. If it is possible, if it is probable, or if it is certain, that the Secretary of the Interior will be imposed upon, I think it is not unreasonable or extravagant to suppose that even that committee might be made the subject of imposition.

Mr. President, I have no feeling about this matter. I felt nothing about it until I found myself arraigned here by the Senator from Connecticut, merely because I thought proper to differ from him as to the mode in which this contract ought to be made. I have said before to the Senate that I was influenced by two considerations on this subject. One was a desire that this work should not be put out to the lowest bidder. Why? Because we have had ample experience in this Chamber that nothing that is put out to the lowest bidder is well executed. However unimportant—if gentlemen think it unimportant—it may be, that the ordinary documents here should be printed on bad paper, with bad type, and when printed on this paper and type, villainously bound, I do think if Congress is going to make a large outlay necessary to publish the results of the late census, it concerns the honor of the nation that such a document should be printed on the best material, in the best manner, and bound most effectually for preservation. This will not be like our ordinary documents, which are kept at home and seen only by our own people, most of them exciting but temporary interest, and soon passing into oblivion. But these census returns, when printed, are destined to go over the whole earth. I, for one, as an American citizen and an American Senator, am not willing, occupying the position we do in the world, that we should stand degraded by a miserable presentation of a low, poor, ineffectual, and creditable execution of this work.

One word as to what my amendment proposes. The Committee on Printing are to contract with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong for printing and binding the census returns on such terms as the committee may think reasonable and proper. I suppose my friend from Connecticut cannot object to that. He would not have the contract made on terms unreasonable and improper. We have confidence in the intelligence and integrity of the members of the committee. We feel sure that they will be able and willing to make a contract upon reasonable and proper terms. We are—at least I am—willing to confide that jurisdiction to them. I formerly said to the Senate, that I should have felt myself bound to vote for relieving the committee from this duty, if the honorable chairman had persisted in his objection. That was on a ground personal to the Senator. But when the committee are willing to undertake it, I am willing to trust them. What is the difficulty about their making a fair and reasonable contract in relation to one part of this work as well as another? If they can make a fair and reasonable contract for the printing and press-work, why can they not for the paper? I do not understand that there is any particular mystery about making a contract for paper. If the size and quality of the paper is stipulated for, and a sample is furnished, why cannot the committee make a reasonable and proper contract for it as well as for press-work? I do not know any reason why they cannot. They can ascertain what are the wholesale prices for paper as well as the price for press-work. So with regard to the binding. There is, therefore, no more necessary reason why the Government should suffer injustice in a contract to be made by this committee, than there is in any other contract to be made by any other committee, or by any officer of the Government. True, sir, every one may make a bad bargain. True, sir, all of us united together, wise, as we all know we are, collectively and individually, may make a bad bargain. The Committee on Printing may be overreached. The Secretary of the Interior may be overreached. So may every human being. But I feel a very strong confidence that while my friend from Connecticut is on that committee, there will be no great amount of overreaching practiced on the Government; and if I wanted any reason to make me additionally confident in the trust reposed in the committee, the very fact that he has been designated a member of it, would furnish it.

Sir, exercising what I consider an unquestionable jurisdiction of legislative power over this subject; invading no Executive right; offering affronts and insults to no one; I propose to amend this resolution so as to leave the Committee on Printing to enter into this contract. For the reasons which I have stated, I think they can and will make a fair, just, and reasonable bargain. The honorable Senator from Connecticut seems to think that large profits will be made out of the Government. He said he would not say exorbitant profits. Well, this is a large work; and, for my own part, I am willing to pay a large and liberal compensation to any body of contractors, or any individual contractor, who will give it to us so executed as to be a credit to the country and worthy of preservation. I have no desire whatever that persons who do work of this kind for the Government should be otherwise than well paid. I believe there is no more striking exhibition of "penny wise, pound folly," than in the attempt to obtain from others work, or property, or service, for less than a fair and full remuneration. I should be extremely sorry if my friend from the Committee on Printing would be disposed—I do not believe he would—to make a hard and exacting bargain. On the contrary, I do him the full credit to believe, that while he wants to do the Government all justice, he would be the last man on the committee who would be willing to do injustice to individuals.

Now, supposing the contract well made, my friend from Connecticut is exceedingly disturbed because my amendment proposes to supersede the necessity of those precise, accurate, and cautious provisions which the committee might think proper to put in the contract for its effectual execution. I have no doubt in the world that the committee will do their best; I have no doubt that their best will be good. But inasmuch as I think the committee could devise no better plan than the one proposed in the amendment which I have submitted, I see no reason why we should leave to the committee that which we can better do ourselves. And I am very certain of one thing—that my honorable friend, the chairman of the committee, will be extremely glad to be relieved from that responsibility, as he would from any other responsibility not fairly and necessarily imposed upon him in connection with this business. What is the proposal? To leave to the Secretary of the Interior the supervision of the execution of the work. There is, surely, no impropriety in that. This is a document compiled under his superintendence. It came from his Department, and its supervision naturally falls to his Department. In that he will be aided by the head of the Census Bureau, who is familiar with the whole work, and who has the strongest possible interest in its faithful, correct, and perfectly accurate execution.

Now, what is proposed better than this? The honorable Senator says that I propose first to let the committee make the contract, and then not to allow them to complete the business. The reason for that is very obvious. The Committee on Printing can easily make a contract, and when the contract is settled there is no necessity for their further interposition. If this work is to be executed it will be going on for months. It will be in process of execution during the recess of Congress. The supervision must be vigilant and incessant. You must, therefore, have somebody to execute it who is required to be here, who is always ready to apply himself to the exercise of such functions. This the committee cannot do. If the printing is to go on during the session, would the honorable Senator propose that the members of the Joint Committee on Printing should give up their time to the daily supervision of the mode of the execution of the contract. If the printing is to go on during the recess of Congress, would the Senator propose that the members of the Joint Committee should sit here, each drawing his per diem, for the purpose of supervising the execution of this printing?

I think that if this matter is properly considered, Senators will come to the conclusion, that if my amendment is not the best in the world, it is a fair and reasonable one. If there were any errors and mistakes in it, I think my friend from Connecticut might have pointed them out in good temper, and not have treated me as if I was coming forward to aid and abet the honorable Senator from Indiana in making a foray into the Treasury of the United States. I can assure my friend that I have no such purpose in view. I want this work to be executed. I want it taken out of the lowest-bidder system. I wish it to be well done, and done in a way in which it shall be honorable to the Government. I want the man who executes it to be well paid for it; acting upon the same rule here in regard to the public business that I trust I do in regard to my private transactions. To insure the faithful execution of the work, I am willing to trust to the extremely honorable gentleman who is at the head of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. CASS. I desire to say a few words on this subject, and they shall be but a very few. The necessity of public printing is felt by all. The question before the Senate is, as to the mode. Shall we effect it by a contract previously entered into, and wait its execution, or shall we take the means of effecting it ourselves, under the supervision of the proper committee? Now, why not give an open contract, as it is called? For very sufficient reasons, founded on experience. In the first place, you have no security in such a case as to the time, as I observed on another occasion, and the decennial period may again come round before you get your census printed. You will not get the President's message, probably, until the end of the session. We expend thousands and thousands of dollars for printing the documents, whose interest depends on their immediate use for the American people, and the subject of them sometimes passes into oblivion before the documents appear. Now will we pursue such a system in regard to such an important work as this?

Again: all experience shows that you cannot depend upon the execution of the contracts made with the lowest bidders. Propositions are made exceedingly low—lower than parties can afford to do them; and then they must do one of two things—abandon the contract, or do the work in an improper manner, and with improper materials. If the contracts are abandoned, and Congress is not in session, the work goes over to another session. So it may be through the whole period. On the other hand, and as the Senator from North Carolina correctly observed, this is one of that class of documents which requires to be well done. If a contractor enters into an improvident contract, his only other resource besides that which I have mentioned, is to do the work badly, as a great deal of our printing is done. I am sure every Senator must be ashamed of the mode in which a great deal of our printing is executed. I presume there is no gentleman here who would have work for his own private use done in the manner in which much of our work is done here.

Then for these three very sufficient reasons, that we may not have the work done at all—that we may have it delayed, or badly done, it is proposed that the committee should enter into a contract with some person or other, on reasonable and proper terms, to execute this work within a proper time. Is this anything very extraordinary under this Government? Is it one of those extraordinary propositions that occasioned a revolution in the mind of every honest man, such as it appears to have occasioned in the mind of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, and on which he has spent so much virtuous indignation? Certainly not. You do the same thing every day. If you pass an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars for a particular building, you leave it to the executive officer to expend it as he pleases, to make a contract for the materials, and then have it put up by day's labor, or contract for both materials and labor. He may expend it just in that way which he thinks the interests of the country require. This is done very frequently. Our statute-books are filled with just such cases. The same principle is adopted in the Army—in the Navy—in every department of Government. It is a discretion you necessarily intrust sometimes to one officer and sometimes to another.

May we ask, why do we not leave this to the discretion of the executive officers? For the very best of all reasons, because there is danger of the work being not done at all, or badly done; and it is a question whether three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, constituting the Joint Committee on Printing, are not as competent to execute this duty as any executive officer of the Government, be he high or low. Will any man say they have not integrity enough to execute it faithfully and justly, as much as any officer of the Government out of the walls of this Chamber? No one would advance such a preposterous idea. No man, with any respect for his own feelings or the feelings of his colleagues, would say that such is the case. I take it that in the formation of this contract the duty is safely lodged in these three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, particularly when they have so able and so willing a man as the Senator from Connecticut to watch their proceedings; and I am confident that no officer of the Government, from the President down to the lowest officer, (if you can apply the term "low" to any officer of the Government,) is more able to do this work.

Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong are designated in the resolution. Why? Every one knows that they are ready to go on with the work. They have got the materials—they have got the presses. Therefore they are designated. What is required? Simply, that a proper and just contract should be made with them by six members of Congress responsible to their respective Houses, and responsible to the country for their action. All I have to say is, that if any member of this Senate will rise up and say that this power is not safely lodged in the hands of six such men, he has a much lower opinion of a member of Congress and of his integrity than I have.

A word now with respect to another point which was very well met by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. It is that this power of supervision given to the Secretary of the Interior is all right—is just precisely as it should be. I understand that the gentlemen who are named in the resolution as contractors are perfectly willing that there should be this supervision. They are perfectly willing that they should be checked by a high officer of the Government. It is preposterous to talk about insulting an officer of the Government by requiring him to do this duty. If he should feel insulted by having such a duty imposed on him by Congress, he has one clear remedy, that is, to quit his office. But I know very well the Secretary of the Interior is a man of high character and a faithful officer, and he would be guilty of no such folly. He would execute our law requiring him to superintend the expenditure of one or two hundred thousand dollars, and he would not consider it an insult to see that the work was properly done. Now how could the Committee of Congress execute this duty of supervision? How would they have the time to devote to it? It was very well said by the Senator from North Carolina, they cannot go every day and see how the contractor is getting along. I take it that any contractor for such a work as this, intending to execute the contract, would, from day to day, and as the work went on, submit it to the supervisory power. He would not wait until one half or three quarters of the work was done, for fear it might be rejected; but he would from day to day, and from time to time, as should be necessary, exhibit his work and ascertain the opinion of the supervisory officer upon it, and act accordingly. The committee cannot do that, especially as the work will not be finished, I presume, until after the close of the session of Congress. Are the committee to be kept here during the recess to attend to it, or will you commit it to a proper and responsible officer of the Government in whose department this work originates? I intended to say something more on the subject; but I have already consumed time enough. I will say that in reviewing the whole matter, I can see no reasonable objection—no sacrifice of public interests—no risk of duty that will be committed, by allowing a committee of this body to make this contract, for I suppose the committee will make a just and proper one on their own responsibility. It will be as safe in their hands as in the hands of any officer of the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. I am sorry to be compelled to trouble the Senate with any remarks on this subject, as I consumed a great deal of time when it was under consideration before. It is in every way distasteful to me, and I approach it with great reluctance, on many accounts. I think the views which I suggested at the close of the debate on this resolution when last discussed, some three weeks ago, apply to the subject as it is again presented to us. The proposition is, to do what we are still unprepared to do. It is a proposition to print a work which is not before us, and the character and extent of which we neither know nor understand. Now, can any Senator upon this floor tell me what it is proposed to print? What is the extent or character of the work? What number of pages, or what number of volumes will it make? Does any Senator know anything about it? If so, I should be glad to hear. For the last three weeks, since the question was postponed, I have examined it as closely and as thoroughly as I was able to do. I have investigated it in a spirit of candor, and with a sincere desire to learn enough of it to guide my judgment for this occasion; but I have been utterly unable to ascertain what, or how much, is proposed by the resolution to be printed. And I venture now to say, that if any Senator will rise and state his opinions as to the extent of the work, or what part of it shall be printed, there will be no two Senators here to agree with him.

If, in its present form, and with the obstacles I have stated in the way of its practical execution, this resolution be adopted, we shall place ourselves in a position which I cannot better express my opinion of, than by an anecdote, which, if the Senate will pardon me, I will relate: In past times, it is told, there existed, somewhere in my good old native State, Virginia, a convivial club, composed of some dozen or more of gentlemen, who were fond of wine and goodliving, and once a week, or oftener, met each other around the social board, the wine, perhaps, predominating at the entertainment. During the time of this association, the country was afflicted by a severe and protracted drought. No rain had fallen for many weeks. Great apprehension begun to be felt for the fate of the growing crops, and the general welfare of the community. At this time, a meeting of the club was held, and one of the members proposed, as a means of propitiating the overruling providence, that the club should so far moderate their indulgences as to abstain from drinking until it should rain; and a formal resolution to that effect was adopted. But the drought continued. Several weeks rolled by, and several meetings of the club were held. The thirst of the earth was great, but not greater than that of the club. A fourth or a fifth meeting was held, and yet the skies gave no signs of relenting. At last, an old and influential member rose and gravely declared that his drought had become intolerable; and that as relief was indispensable to him, as he supposed it was to his associates, he would propose an expedient, by which it might be afforded to all; and he put it in this form: "Resolved, That it rains." This was adopted by acclamation, and the club returned joyously to their potatoes.

The adoption of this resolution will, I think, place the Senate somewhat in the position of this convivial club. It will be resolving, or at least assuming, that a state of things exists which, in fact, does not exist. It will be assuming that a certain amount and kind of information is before us which, in fact, is not here. It will be assuming, and legislating upon the assumption, that a provision of the census law has been complied with by an Executive Department of the Government, and certain matters therein required to be laid before us as the indispensable basis of our action are actually before us, when no one will or can say that such is the fact—when, indeed, it is not the fact. For one, I am unwilling to place myself in that position. It is true, we have had brought before us a plan and arrangement of the census returns for the State of Maryland, as a specimen of the whole work. Here is the book. Have Senators examined it? Is this a specimen of the work which the Senate is willing shall be printed for each State? Will any Senator open this book, look at it, and say he is willing to print a similar work for each of the States? If he is, he differs very widely from me. I find in it matter which is altogether unfit for publication. There is much matter here which was not contemplated, intended, nor provided for by the law; such as the Superintendent of the Census had no authority to incorporate in the census returns, or present here in a plan of publication. He has exceeded his authority, and put in a large amount of matter which the law did not authorize nor provide for. Here we have a history of Maryland. Did the law provide for that? In the provision it made for employing a clerk to superintend the taking of the census, did it contemplate the establishment of an historical bureau and the appointment of a historiographer of the United States? And even supposing such had been the contemplation or provision of the law, has there been sufficient time to compile such a history as we would be justified in publishing? or, I would ask, and that, too, without disrespect or disparagement to the particular individual, has he the requisite qualifications to write a history of all, or of any, of the States of this Union? Here we have a general historical account of Maryland, occupying ten pages—and then a particular history of each county, making eight pages more—eighteen pages together, out of ninety-six, or nearly one fifth of the whole book! Now, where is the basis of such a history? Whence were the materials drawn, and by whom collected? Who will vouch for their accuracy? And yet, if we publish them, as proposed, in an official form, and send them out under our sanction and authority, we make ourselves responsible before the world for everything this young gentleman, who is called the Superintendent of Census, may have thought proper to write or compile without authority of law. I, for one, am unwilling to indorse such a history as this, which, in my opinion, without disparaging the intelligence or impugning the motives of its author, I cannot believe he was qualified to write or compile.

I wish now to call the attention of Senators to another portion of this book; and it is one upon which I claim to speak with some freedom. I refer to what is headed "Medical Statistics." Of this, there are some twenty-five pages in this book of ninety-six pages. True, in the census bill direction was given to ascertain the deaths, and the causes of the deaths of individuals throughout the United States, for the year preceding the 1st of June, 1850. But did any one suppose at that time—did any one understand, that it was to embrace a compilation of medical statistics by the deputy marshals, and a treatise on the subject preceding the statistics by a young gentleman who is not known as a medical man, and who, so far as I know, makes no pretension to be one? Did any one suspect that such a production as this was to be brought here? Here we have a treatise on the nicest questions in medical science, which have been mooted for ages by the profession; here, also, tabular statements of disease, and dogmatical discriminations between fevers, laid off in rule and figure work, with the precision of a demonstration in mathematics! Here, sir, we find catarrhal, inflammatory, bilious, and congestive fevers, regularly separated and arranged; and even that nicest, and often most difficult, of all distinctions, (I mean the distinction between typhus and typhoid fever,) drawn with a boldness and a dogmatism from which the ablest and most experienced of our medical men would shrink. And all this by a young gentleman who, it is to be presumed, cannot have the peculiar qualifications indispensable to the performance of such a work, but selected altogether, it is understood, for his present position in view of his general intelligence, and some aptitude in statistical studies.

But suppose, for the argument, that the law did require him to collect all this mass of medical statistics, and even to write the preliminary treatise with which he has favored us, is there any obligation upon us to print and publish it? I apprehend not. It is wholly within our discretion to exclude from the publication, or to retain, any portion of the matter presented to us. If, in our opinion, any portion be valueless, (as I suppose every one will admit this to be,) it is not only our right, but our duty to exclude and reject it. Pending the census bill, and while the schedules were under discussion here, I moved to strike out this one about diseases, and gave as a reason, that the persons who would take the census, were incompetent to obtain or give reliable information on the subject. That column was retained, however, and here we have the result—more than one fourth of the whole book—twenty-five out of ninety-six pages—made up of “medical statistics,” and a preliminary discourse upon them, which, I venture to say that no intelligent man in or out of the Senate, and no one deserving the name of physician anywhere, would rely upon as authority for any purpose whatever. Surely, sir, no obligation rests upon us to print and publish anything like that. Every consideration of propriety, it seems to me, forbids it.

Here, sir, we have eighteen pages of history and geology, and twenty-five pages of medicine, in a book of ninety-six pages—nearly one half! I will not dwell longer upon this as indicating the character of the work. Nor do I undertake to assert positively, that it is inaccurate in either history or its medicine. But I do say, that we have no such evidence of its accuracy, or its value, as to justify us in printing it at great expense, and sending it out to the world as an authoritative basis of important calculations vitally affecting the interest of our constituents.

Here, then, comes up the question, what portion of this work shall be printed? Is the Senate prepared to answer this question now? Or is it intended that the Printing Committee shall answer it, by deciding what shall or what shall not be printed? As I said, when this resolution was under consideration before, I do not think the committee qualified to make the contract as at first proposed. Then far less qualified are they for this additional and complicated duty of deciding upon the character of every part of the work.

I have submitted these remarks, in support of the position with which I set out, that we have not before us facts enough to judge of the character of the whole work it is proposed to print, or to determine how much of it ought to be printed. With my present impressions, if called upon to say what part of this book should be printed, I would at once throw away nearly one half of it, and then consider how much of the remainder was worth preserving. Would the Senate agree with me in that? Some Senators would, I am very sure; but there are others, a majority, probably, who would not. How, then, is it to be settled? If not settled by the Senate in advance, and the resolution should go to the committee, would we be authorized to make the selection of the parts for publication, and exclude the rest? Or would we be expected to print the whole—history, geology, medicine, and all, in a lump, as it comes from the Census Office?

I will here remind the Senate of the circumstances attending the preparation and passage of the census bill. Those circumstances show that Congress intended and determined that taking the Seventh Census should be no hasty or unconsidered work; but that every step in its progress, from beginning to end, should be so carefully taken as to secure accuracy, and give value to the work. Accordingly, the first step taken was the appointment of a Census Board, composed of the high Executive officers of the Government, to prepare and submit a plan. Next, the Senate appointed a select committee of the most experienced members of this body, to consider and report. Then the joint labors of this Board and this committee, were submitted to the Senate, and here, as you well know, underwent a protracted, careful, and thorough discussion and revision. Having, after material modifications passed, here, it went through the ordeal of the other House. The law, as it stands upon the statute-book, is the result of all that labor. That law directs when and how the census shall be taken, and the subjects to be embraced in it, leaving nothing in that respect to the discretion of secretaries, clerks, or superintendents. And it directs, also, that, when the work of collecting the prescribed information should have been completed, then the officer in charge should arrange and submit it, with a plan for publication, to this session of Congress. And for what purpose was this provision for its presentation to us here, made in the law? Coupled with the other provision, that its printing should be left to our direction, shows clearly enough that it was thus reserved for our revision, for the purpose of insuring its accuracy, as far as such a work would be made accurate, by repeated and careful examination, not only by Executive officers, but by Congress itself. Now, sir, all this precaution, deemed wise at the time, was a very unnecessary and senseless procedure, or it is now proposed, by hurrying the adoption of this resolution, is an exceedingly imprudent and improvident thing.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] raised a question, and was responded to by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] upon which I must say a word, as it involves the action of the Printing Committee. It is, whether this is Congressional or departmental printing. The Senator from Connecticut says it is departmental printing, while the Senator from North Carolina says it is Congressional printing.

Mr. BADGER. I say that it is Congressional printing, for Congress to do what it pleases with it; but that it does not come under the contract for Congressional printing.

Mr. BORLAND. I will state the opinion and action of the Printing Committee on that point. When this resolution was originally introduced and sent to the committee, the contractor for the printing for this Congress sent in a communication claiming the census printing under his contract. Upon the question thus presented, the committee decided, if not unanimously, very nearly so, that it was not such printing as the public printer could claim under his contract, for the single but sufficient reason that it was expressly reserved by the census bill for the future direction of Congress, and the contract had been subsequently made under the general law, in view of the existence of that express reservation in a special law. It was not, therefore, such printing, though certainly Congressional printing, as the contractor could claim; and for a similar reason, it certainly is not departmental printing. To dispose of it now, therefore, as Congress may determine, is but carrying out the law of 1850, and is neither trenching upon the rights of the public printer, nor usurping power which belongs to any one of the Departments.

I will, in conclusion, briefly allude to the objections I urged against this resolution, when it was first before the Senate. I thought then, and still think, that it imposes duties upon the Committee on Printing which were not contemplated by the Senate when the committee was originally organized—duties for which they are not qualified, and which they cannot fairly or properly be called upon to perform. These objections, it seems to me, are valid ones, and ought to be conclusive against the adoption of the resolution. But, sir, as it seems to be the determination of this body to adopt the substance of the resolution in some form, and to impose those duties upon the committee, however repugnant to us they may be, I suppose submission to the Senate's decree will become our duty—to be performed as best we may. And as this must be so, I submit still further to the Senate if, when we are required to begin the work, we ought not, in common fairness, to be allowed to finish it? I am opposed to having any portion of this work imposed upon me; but if I am to be compelled to do it in part, I insist upon doing the whole of it. If I have to make the contract, I claim the privilege of seeing it properly executed. If I am to be held responsible, as surely I will, and ought to be, for the character of the contract, I ask nothing but what is fair when I insist that I shall be allowed to protect myself in that responsibility, throughout the work, by seeing that it is properly done, as I contracted for it to be done, and am best qualified to judge when it is done. I say none of this in disrespect to the Secretary of the Interior; for I have no doubt he would have any work intrusted to him, well and faithfully done; but I say it in simple justice to myself and the committee.

The proposed amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] is to separate the contract for the printing from the purchase of the paper. I do not object to the object thus sought to be accomplished; but I think it unnecessary as part of the resolution. If the committee be given authority to contract for the work of having the census printed, it will be entirely competent for them under that authority to make a separate contract for the paper. I am opposed to hampering the committee with partial instructions. If they are to be instructed, in part, as to how the contract shall be made, I ask that they shall be instructed in every particular. If you require this work of them at all, let their discretion be commensurate with their responsibility.

There is but one more suggestion I have to make, and I am done. And, in making it, I reiterate my opposition to the whole proceeding, but proceed upon the supposition, now become certainty, that this resolution will be adopted in some form. It is the only proposition I expect to offer in the way of amendment. I will read it now for the information of the Senate, and will offer it at a proper time as an amendment to the resolution. It is this:

Provided, That the contract herein required to be made shall be submitted to, and shall receive the ratification of Congress, before it shall be binding upon the parties.

The reason for this, I think, will be obvious, as I feel sure it is a sound one. It is, that those members of the Senate who seem so much disposed to impose this duty upon a committee may, when the duty shall have been performed, have the privilege of sharing its responsibility with those who will have done the labor.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before this part of the census which has now been laid upon our tables was submitted to us for our inspection, I deemed it premature for the Senate to take any definite action on the resolution now before us. We have had laid on our desks that portion of the census which comprises the State of Maryland; and with that before us, I think we are as well prepared to act, and to act definitely in relation to the whole matter, as we can be at any subsequent time.

I think there has been another question mingled with this resolution which does not properly belong to it. When it shall come properly before the Senate, I shall concur, as I do most cheerfully in nearly every word which has fallen from the lips of the chairman of the Committee on Printing. What shall be printed is not now the question. The simple question for us now to determine is: Who shall do it? When that question shall have been settled, I shall concur in nearly all the suggestions that have been made by the chairman of the Committee on Printing. When the measures shall have been matured—when the Senate shall have determined in what manner the work shall be done, I shall offer certain instructions directory to the Committee on Printing, in relation to their duties, their powers, and in relation to what shall or shall not be printed.

In my judgment there is a great portion of this work, relating to medical statistics, that if contained in it at all, may be compressed into a very few pages. I learn that from the Superintendent of the Census Bureau. There are other portions which I think are inappropriately there, as I have stated to the Senate upon another occasion.

There are also, in my judgment, deficiencies which should be supplied. Certainly there are deficiencies which will apply to the section of the Union from which I come. I think I may say to all the New England Senators, and to some of the Senators from other States, where the States are divided into towns, that the whole census returns will be regarded as very nearly useless, unless we can have the census of our States presented by towns. This portion of the census before us, comprising the State of Maryland, is to be the sample, and it contains only counties. Senators will recollect that in some portions of the Union nearly all the power of the State is vested in the municipal authorities of the towns, and, without a tabular statement of the census of the towns, the returns for those States would be useless. But, as I have said, these are questions not now before us, and I do not now propose to discuss them. After the resolution shall have passed, or after some other method shall have been indicated by the Senate, then I think it will be proper for the Senate to determine what shall and what shall not be printed. When that period shall arrive, if no one else will assume the duty, I shall have certain practical points to submit to the consideration of the Senate, and take its opinion upon them.

Several Senators desired that the Senate should now adjourn.

Mr. GWIN. I know that there is an impatience to adjourn all round the Senate; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: On next Monday we shall have up the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] on which he is going to address the Senate; to be followed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] on Tuesday; and to-morrow is private bill day. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] has the floor on another question of importance on Saturday. If we do not come to a vote on this resolution to-day, we shall postpone action upon it to an almost indefinite time. I hope that we shall have something approaching a test vote before we adjourn. We can have something like a test vote to see whether it is the sense of the Senate that this work shall be given to the particular individuals named in the resolution. If that is settled we can go into the details hereafter. I hope, therefore, before the Senate adjourns we shall have a test vote.

Mr. PEARCE next obtained the floor, but yielded it, at the solicitation of Senators, and, On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 5, 1852.

The House met pursuant to adjournment. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. Mr. PARKER, of Pennsylvania, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the memorial of John W. Horton, and forty other citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the abolition by Congress of the national chaplaincy system.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected. Mr. PARKER moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is not in order to-day.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1853, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE STATE OF INDIANA.

Mr. LOCKHART, by unanimous consent, introduced the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, which were referred to the appropriate committees, as indicated below:

A joint resolution instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives in Congress from that State to procure a site for a national armory on the waters of the Ohio river at Evansville, within the State of Indiana; referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A joint resolution in relation to constructing a canal around the Falls of the Ohio river; referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

A joint resolution relative to granting public lands to settlers; referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution for the purpose of obtaining from the General Government a grant of unsold lands in the Vincennes district, Indiana, for the benefit of common schools; referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SWEETSER moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the special orders.

The question was then taken, and the motion agreed to.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, upon the special orders, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The business before the committee is the special order, being Senate bill No. 146, making land warrants assignable, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRENTON] is entitled to the floor from yesterday.

Mr. BRENTON. I do not wish to consume the full time allotted to me under the rule in the further discussion of this question. At the close of my remarks yesterday, I was about to state that in addition to the peculiar facts connected with the question under discussion, and apart from those facts, I placed myself in regard to the third section of this bill upon the higher ground—directed to the importance and propriety of the passage of the bill as it is—that the law by which our land officers are organized, and which fixes the compensation of these officers, is sufficient, to my mind, to justify them in receiving now that for which they have heretofore labored. I believe that it is a well-settled principle of the law regulating contracts between individuals, that where one man renders service for another, and at his request, that the person rendering the service shall be compensated for his labor, according to the terms of the contract made between them; and that if no specific contract is made, then the compensation shall be according to the nature and value of the service rendered, which is generally determined by the custom of the country.

Now, if we are disposed to apply this rule to the case before us, how will the matter stand?

Here are one hundred and thirty-six men, who have been employed by the Government, to perform certain and specific duties, duties which are essential to the execution and administration of your laws, in reference to the disposition of the public domain. These duties have been faithfully performed; and being satisfactory, they are accepted by the Government. This no one will deny. This much being admitted, what is our next duty? Why simply to ascertain the amount of compensation these employees of the Government are entitled to receive.

Then the question arises, how shall this be ascertained? My answer is, according to the law authorizing their employment, and fixing the compensation for their services. What is that law? It is provided that each register and receiver shall receive an annual salary of $500, and a commission of one per cent. on their receipts. Nothing can be plainer than this. Would not a jury of the country decide without hesitation, that they were entitled to their commission on all the lands disposed of by them, by virtue of their authority from the Government? And yet there are gentlemen here who think and say—no doubt honestly—that for more than half of the labor they have performed they shall receive nothing at all. Why is this? Is it because there is any law prohibiting it? I understand that some gentlemen are under the impression, that the acts of Congress authorizing the issue and location of land warrants prohibit this compensation. This is a mistake; there is no such prohibition. Why, then, has the compensation been withheld? Simply because the Department, in their cautious and vigilant guardianship over the public Treasury, have decided against it. And these claims come here in the nature of an appeal from that decision; and all that is required of you is to give the express authority to the proper officers to investigate and allow the claims according to the facts of each case.

But it is contended, that there is not sufficient data from which the Commissioner can determine the amount of these claims. Certainly those who urge this objection have not made themselves familiar with the operations of our land system and land offices. Every register is required to report to the General Land Office monthly, and to furnish an abstract of locations made, with the names of the persons locating, distinguishing between the warrantee and assignee. By taking these abstracts, and deducting from the assigned warrants the amount received under the authority of the act of 1848, the residue is the amount to which these officers are entitled.

But it is said that these officers have profited by receiving illegal fees. Well, this bill is sufficiently guarded on that point, for it provides that no officer who shall be proved to have received any fees not allowed by law, shall be entitled to any compensation by virtue of the provisions of this act.

I shall close with these additional remarks, that if the General Government authorizes its officers to dispose of the public domain for a valuable consideration, whether that consideration be cash or its equivalent, it cannot consistently withhold proper remuneration from its officers.

Suppose that the acts of 1847 and 1850, instead of authorizing the issue of land warrants, had given to the soldiers military scrip, to be received in payment for public lands, would the officers have been compensated for exchanging the public lands for this kind of paper? Certainly; and such has been the practice of the Government; and yet this scrip is not cash. Such scrip is now issued and received in payment for public lands. My argument, in short, is this: that where the Government officers are required to dispose of the public lands for cash or its equivalent, they are entitled to full compensation for their services.

A land warrant is a demand against the Government, and in one sense—and that an important one—equivalent to cash; therefore the officers are entitled to compensation for locating a land warrant. I present my amendment to the third section, and hope that the committee will adopt it, and with it recommend the passage of the Senate bill.

Mr. YATES said: I wish to speak upon two sections of the Senate bill. It seems to me that a simple statement of the facts, is all that is necessary to determine the action of this House in allowing to the registers and receivers the compensation they ask. This House, I am sure, would not willingly do an act of deliberate injustice, nor would it omit to do an act of positive justice. If the members of this House are satisfied that the compensation of registers and receivers has been, and is now, and in the future is likely to be, inadequate, then, sir, it would be an imputation upon the sense of justice of this House to intimate that it would withhold fair and honest compensation.

What are the facts? We have the petitions of registers and receivers before us, stating that their compensation is entirely inadequate. They show to us that their stated compensation is a salary of $500, and a commission of one per cent. on cash sales, and that from this sum is to be deducted clerk-hire, office-rent, fuel, and incidental expenses. They tell us that the compensation of locating warrants does not amount to a sufficient sum to pay clerks, which they are compelled to keep for that service, and the duties of which cannot be performed without clerks. They also inform us that the service of locating warrants is four or five times as great as when the lands are entered with cash; that in the location of each warrant, the registers and receivers have to examine every warrant, and the assignments on the same—to examine the petition, affidavits, certificates, and powers of attorney where they are located by an agent of the grantee, to make the entries upon the several books of his office, to forward his abstracts to Washington, &c. And we are truly told, that in many districts since the passage of the bounty land laws of 1847, the entries with cash are comparatively few. These entries are made with land warrants, so that the land officers are deprived almost entirely of the one per cent. commission to which they are entitled on actual cash sales. And we are now about to enact that these land warrants shall be made assignable. This will bring them into the market in large quantities; they will find their way to the different land offices, and almost every entry will be made with warrants. There are very few men who will plunk down the gold and silver at the rate of $200 for a hundred and sixty acres of land when they can buy a warrant for $80 or $100, and with that buy the same quantity of land. Thus, sir, we see that the inevitable effect of making these warrants assignable will be to render that part of the law which gives one per cent. commission on actual cash entries almost a nullity, leaving the land officer with the salary of $500, and a trifling compensation out of the commission, from which are to be deducted clerk-hire, office-rent, fuel, and incidental expenses.

I will refer the House to facts and figures, which I have obtained in answer to a letter addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and which will show to this House that the past and present registers and receivers in the land office at Springfield, Illinois, have not received an adequate compensation for their services.

Between the passage of the act of February 11th, 1847, and the 31st of October, 1851, a period of four years and eight months, the number of military bounty land warrants located in the district of lands subject to sale at Springfield, Illinois, was 1983; of this number 1800 were assigned warrants, upon which the register and receiver received fifty cents on each warrant. Thus in a period of four years and eight months, the register and receiver each received for the locating of assigned land warrants, the sum of $900, or at the rate of $225 per annum. In the same period of four years and eight months, the amount of cash received from the sales of the public lands at the same office, was $102,594, upon which the commission of one per cent. would be $1,025; or at the rate of $256 per year. Now add the $225 received upon assigned land warrants, and the $256, the commission received on cash sales, to the stated compensation of $500, and we find that the whole sum received by the register and receiver for each year since the passage of the act of February 11th, 1847, has been $981. Now, sir, deduct from this sum a reasonable allowance to be paid by them for a competent clerk, say $400, for office-rent $150, and $150 for fuel, stationery, incidental expenses, and for receiving, safe-keeping and transmitting the public moneys, and there is left to the register and receiver each the small pittance of $281, as a compensation for their services, and the discharge of duties of a high and responsible character. Now, sir, these are the facts; and I appeal to this House, by a solemn sense of justice, not to withhold a fair compensation to these officers for the services they have rendered.

This House cannot hesitate between the propriety of passing a bill now allowing to registers and receivers for their services heretofore in locating these warrants, and the plan recommended by the honorable chairman of the committee—namely, that each register and receiver who shall deem himself aggrieved shall present his separate claim to Congress. Shall we impose upon every land officer the arduous duty of becoming a suitor to Congress, of employing an agent or coming in person at great expense to Congress for relief? Such a course, in most instances, would be tantamount to a denial of justice, for I am sure very few of them would undertake so hazardous an enterprise as to obtain from Congress this compensation.

But, sir, upon the score of public economy, which gentlemen seem to regard so much, had we not better make a fair allowance now than adopt the course of the chairman of the committee? We shall find it but a poor sort of economy to invite these numerous claimants to present their individual claims to Congress. One important object of making the compensation now, is to prevent the presentation of these separate claims. If each individual register and receiver should present his claim here and occupy the time and attention of our committees, and they should undergo discussion in both legislative branches, it would cost the Government more than to allow at once by this bill a fair and honest compensation. Every one acquainted with the history of legislation, its debates and delays, will not hesitate to admit the force of this view of the case.

It is contended that plenty of good men can be got to do the service for the present compensation. And so, sir, plenty of good men, as was properly remarked by my colleague, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] could be got to discharge the duties of Representative on this floor for one half the compensation which we receive. Sir, I hope the day will never arrive when the offices of this country and of this character are to be dispensed to the lowest bidder. High character and superior qualifications should be the recommendations to office, and the compensation should always be such as to secure the most meritorious men in office.

The duties of the land office are not merely ministerial. It is a high post of honor and responsibility. It has become an intimate and important part of the administration of the Government. It is a part of a difficult and complicated branch of one of the departments of the Government, the proper management of which requires a great deal of method, accuracy, and the exercise of good judgment, and involving the greatest responsibility. The register and receiver have to enter into heavy bonds. The receiver has the custody of the public moneys, and his conduct is all the time subject to the severest public scrutiny. The very kind of men whom the Government wants in such a capacity are the men who, in their private business, could accumulate as much as the Government would be justifiable in allowing. And, sir, we cannot expect them to abandon a lucrative and profitable business to take an office involving the highest responsibilities and the discharge of most arduous duties for a pitiful compensation. And I have been told by these officers, that they would be forced to resign unless their compensation was increased; and many of them would have resigned long ago but for their confident reliance upon the justice of Congress to render them a fair return—an honest equivalent for the services they have been performing.

Mr. Chairman, I will for a moment address my remarks to another feature in the bill—to the section which extends the provisions of the former act so as to allow the soldier a day for each twenty miles of travel from the place of organization of his company to the place of his enlistment. I cordially concur in this feature of the bill. I believe, sir, that there are as meritorious claimants among those who have been engaged in the suppression of Indian hostilities as among those who have engaged in the Mexican and other wars. Among them, sir, are the pioneers of our western country, that hardy and adventurous race, who have marched in the van of civilization, and encountered with heroic fortitude all the vicissitudes of the forest, and all the perils of Indian warfare, and yet, sir, have not been recognized as the soldiers of the Government. They, sir, are the representatives of that glorious epoch in the march of empire westward, "when every cabin was a fortress, and every man, yea, every woman, was a soldier."

Sir, I suppose I did not understand the remarks of my friend from Ohio in his reflections, as I supposed, upon a most meritorious class of our citizens. I do not know, sir, whom he meant, some weeks ago, by the term "corn-stalk army." Does he mean the militia? Whether he means them or not, it has been the custom of certain politicians to heap reproaches upon this, which I esteem the main arm, the strong bulwark, the impregnable fortress of our country's defence. After all, sir, it is to this class, as well as to the soldiers of the regular Army, to whom our country is indebted for some of the most brilliant military achievements which adorn our past history. They, sir, have been the men of strong arms and bold hearts, who have borne aloft our flag in triumph on every field of battle, and who, alike at Lexington, at the Thames, at New Orleans, at Buena Vista, at Cerro Gordo, won for American arms laurels as green and imperishable as ever decked the brow of the victorious warrior.

Mr. Speaker, now is not the best time to examine the policy of this Government as to the right mode of disposing of the public lands. At some future period I hope to have the attention of this House while I give my views at length upon this subject. There is one thing which I will say now, and that is, that the United States ought not, in its system of financial policy, to look to the public lands as a source of revenue—first, because, in fact, in deducting disbursements made in their purchases from the Indians, in surveying them, keeping up land offices, the bureau of the public lands at Washington, and the expenses of legislation about them, they do not realize to the Government five cents to the acre. We want a stable, firm system of revenue, such as we have from customs, which, while it affords sufficient revenue to the Government, affords protection to American labor and a home market to the American farmer.

Our sure policy with regard to the public lands is to bestow them with liberal hands, first to those who have evinced their devotion to their country in its defence; second, by munificent appropriations for the promotion of popular education, and especially to the education of the blind, the insane, and deaf and dumb; third, to grant portions of these lands to the States for making railroads, to be free to the United States for the transportation of mails, and troops, and munitions of war; and lastly, to grant them in limited quantities to the actual settler for himself and his posterity forever.

If the public lands are appropriated for these purposes, they will be fountains of blessedness, political, social, commercial to our country; these thousands of millions of acres—this mighty and beautiful and boundless domain of rich and fertile lands will be exhaustless mines of wealth, from which we may draw from year to year, for even centuries to come, for the great purposes of internal improvement, popular education, beneficence to the soldier, and the freehold homes of our citizens.

[Here the Chairman's hammer fell, the time fixed by the House for closing debate upon the bill under consideration having expired.]

Mr. MASON. Me. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. I believe I am entitled to the floor for one hour, under the rule of the House, the debate having been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] who reported from the select committee the House bill, is not entitled to the floor, that bill not now being under consideration. The gentleman will recollect that the Chair yesterday decided that the Senate bill must take precedence, and the House bill, therefore, is not now under consideration. He will not be entitled to the floor, to close debate, until the House bill shall have been under consideration.

Mr. DUNHAM. This whole matter was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at the same time, and the debate was closed on both bills by the same resolution. I shall therefore feel myself bound to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and claim my right to occupy the floor for an hour—having reported the House bill, and debate having been closed upon both bills at the same time.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection to the gentleman's making an hour's speech. My objection claiming the floor was merely to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution adopted by the House provides that debate shall terminate in two hours after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall have resumed the consideration of the Senate bill and joint resolution of the House. The bill and resolutions were referred jointly; but when the House resolved itself into the committee on the special order, the Chair decided, that although both propositions had been referred in the same special order, yet only one bill could be under consideration in committee at the same time, and that the Senate bill must have precedence. The Senate bill has, therefore, been under discussion. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] claims the right now to speak one hour, the debate upon the two bills having been closed. The Chair decides, that inasmuch as the Senate bill is under consideration, amendments, if there be any, must be offered and the bill disposed of, before the House bill will come up. When that bill shall be up, the gentleman can claim his hour, but not till then. From that decision the gentleman appeals.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think the Chairman has put the case rather stronger than it really is. I think he has only stated one side of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. DUNHAM. I know it is not, but I presume the Chair will permit me to state my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will permit the gentleman to state his point of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. The resolution adopted by the House closes debate upon both resolutions at the same time.

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman has no right to debate the question. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can state his point of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman from Illinois is getting a little ahead of his time. I have the right to state the facts of the case. I say I think that the resolution of the House outweighed the decision of the Chairman of the committee that only one resolution was under consideration. I think that decision was overruled by the House when they adopted the resolution closing debate upon both bills at the same time.

Mr. BISSELL. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not stating his proposition, but is making an argument. I object to it. It is not in order.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman will listen to me, I apprehend he will find whether I am stating my proposition or making an argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to stating his proposition.

Mr. DUNHAM. I have only to say that the resolution closing debate upon both propositions at the same time, as a matter of course blends them together, and they are, therefore, both legitimately before the committee. Upon that ground I claim the right to address the committee under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair still thinks he stated the question fairly. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. BISSELL. I wish to make a single inquiry. As I understand it, this Senate bill has not been before the select committee, of which the gentleman from Indiana was chairman, at all, and therefore has not been reported by that committee?

Mr. DUNHAM. Everybody knows that.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, that is all I desired to ask.

The question now being "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" upon a division, there were—ayes 73, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. DUNHAM demanded tellers; but only 16 rising, they were not ordered.

Mr. COBB. Then we shall be obliged to have a call of the House. I ask for a recount.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and upon a second division there were—ayes 76, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. FOWLER demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. FOWLER and BRECKENRIDGE were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 99, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained by the committee.

Mr. BELL. I rise simply to make an inquiry. Will the committee proceed with the consideration of the Senate bill, or is the House bill now under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the House bill has not been before the committee.

Mr. BELL. I desire to say something upon this subject, but it is upon the House bill that I wish to speak.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to ask if an amendment has been made to this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do not pass; and that the committee do then proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Indiana will move that the Senate bill be laid aside for the present in order to give him an opportunity to make his speech, I will vote for his motion; but if he moves to lay it aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass, I cannot go with him. I am for striking out all of the bill except the first section, and of passing it in that form.

Mr. DUNHAM. I will vary my motion to suit the gentleman. I move that the bill be laid aside for the present.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I propose to amend the first section by adding, as a proviso, the sixth section of the bill reported by the select committee, which will allow these bounty land warrants to be located upon any land subject to private entry.

The first section of the Senate bill is as follows, viz:

"Be it enacted, &c., That all warrants for military bounty land, which have been or may hereafter be issued under any law of the United States, and all valid locations of the same, which have been, or may hereafter be made, are hereby declared to be assignable, by deed or instrument of writing, made and executed after the taking effect of this act, according to such form, and pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owners of the warrant or location: Provided, That any person entitled to preemption right to any land, shall be entitled to use any such land warrant in payment of the same, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, for the quantity of land therein specified."

Mr. MASON. My amendment is to add at the end of this section the following:

Provided, That the warrants which have been, or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of said act or of this act, may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location, at the minimum price.

Mr. CLARK. Is the House bill now under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. No, it is not. But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] proposes to amend the first section of the Senate bill, by annexing thereto, by way of proviso, the sixth section of the bill reported by the select committee as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. MASON. The object of it is simply to allow these bounty land warrants to be located upon any of the lands of the United States instead of being confined to the refuse lands which have been picked over for years past. That is the object of the amendment. Now, I would state that the first section of this bill, with the amendment I propose, is all that is necessary for the House, at this time, to pass. And I would briefly give a few reasons for it. The first section of this bill proposes to do that which every member here is instructed by his constituents to do—merely to make these bounty land warrants assignable. The law, as originally passed, as we understood, and as those who passed it understood it, left these bounty land warrants assignable. The Secretary of the Interior gave the law a different construction. At the first of the last session of Congress my colleague [Mr. CALDWELL] introduced the resolution to make land warrants assignable; it passed this House by an overwhelming majority; and it went to the Senate, which body let it sleep to the end of the session, and it was finally lost for want of time. We passed another resolution at this session of Congress making these warrants assignable; it was sent to the Senate, and came back here, loaded down with a whole mass of amendments. Now, I have heard it said that there were those who, had they been present when the Lord's Prayer and Decalogue were made, would have moved amendments thereto.

This is a simple, plain bill, merely to make these warrants assignable; and that other provision which I offer here now is to make them subject to location upon all the lands of the United States. This is what the country look to us to do, and this is what they desire us to do.

Now, with regard to the payment of registers and receivers, I have no time to say anything, except briefly this: that I have been informed that they would not suffer, their families would not suffer, and that they are not in such a state of suffering as requires that this bill should not be delayed. If their claims are just, let them be taken up separately and referred to an appropriate committee for investigation, and if they are entitled to compensation, pay them; but do not hang a provision to pay them on to a meritorious bill, which everybody is in favor of, and which the whole country demands that we shall pass. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] wants to appropriate some $200,000 to these land offices. I have not examined the question, but have no doubt if they are entitled to a greater amount of compensation than they have received that the House will pass a bill for their relief. If, indeed, these registers and receivers, who are receiving at least $500 a year from the Government, are suffering, surely these old soldiers, who have received the mere pittance of a bounty land warrant, and who are generally in a poor condition—much poorer than the registers and receivers—demand at our hands immediate action on this subject.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope the amendment will not be made; though if that provision were in this section, I should have no particular objection to it. I do not think it important one way or the other; but I shall vote against it, because I desire to see the Senate bill, which has been well, carefully, and considerably prepared and adjusted, go through the House with the least possible amendment; for if amended in any material respect—as for instance as indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES] who proposes to strike out all but the first section—it stands no chance of going through the Senate again. And if we pass this bill through the House in any shape—which I trust we shall not—which denies to registers and receivers any future or any past reasonable compensation for the services which they perform in locating these warrants, I have no hope at all that it can pass the Senate. I have taken especial pains to understand how these things are in the Senate. Therefore I am opposed to this amendment, and I shall be opposed to all other amendments of a material character which may be offered to the bill. I shall be opposed to the bill itself, unless it provides not only for the payment of the land officers in future, but a fair compensation, to be determined at the head of Departments in Washington, for those who have already performed these services without pay—services which they never would have consented to perform had they not had reasonable expectation that Congress would do justice by them. These registers and receivers were entitled to one per cent. upon the moneys received in payment for public lands. At that a large portion of these receivers and registers, and especially in the older settled parts of the new States, barely made a living. When you passed this law, scattering like leaves in autumn land warrants all over the country, they took the place of cash, and speculators went and entered lands with these warrants, thus depriving the registers and receivers of the per cent. which they were authorized to receive before, and which hardly compensated them at the time. They held on, year after year, in the expectation, from the frequent movements which were made here upon this subject, that Congress would provide a compensation to them for those services. Some of them have not received as much as $200 a year over and above the expense of clerk hire. Now here comes in a bill—a sensible bill—passed through the Senate with great care and deliberation, providing in future that these officers shall be compensated for the services which they may render, and it is proposed, at once, to strike from the bill those essential features—which are really everything in it—and which ought to entitle the bill to the especial regard of the House;—to strike from it that provision which makes compensation to receivers and registers, and leave those officers to resign their places—as many of them, I am well assured, will—unprovided for; and thus to let those offices become vacant. Let no man pretend to say there is no such probability. I tell you, sir, that if Congress signifies its determination not to compensate these officers for the services they render in locating these warrants, there are officers in the West who will be compelled to resign, and there are no competent men who will be found to take their places.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The second section is not under discussion; the motion is, therefore, not now in order.

Mr. HALL. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] as follows:

"Provided further, That when said warrants shall be located upon lands which are subject to entry at a greater minimum than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the locators of said warrants shall pay to the United States, in cash, the difference between the value of such warrants at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and the tract of land located on."

I suppose it is only necessary to explain the object of this amendment very briefly, in order to gain for it the favorable consideration of this committee. We have heretofore—and I hope we shall hereafter—made grants of land for the purpose of internal improvement, in all of which grants we have stipulated that each alternate section shall be raised to double the minimum price, viz: two dollars and fifty cents per acre. Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON] authorizes warrants to be located upon all lands subject to private entry. Hence, if my amendment is not adopted, the holders of land warrants can locate them upon reserved sections as well as upon other public lands. I am willing that holders of land warrants shall locate upon these reserved sections; but I think that when they do so their warrants should pass at only one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; so that if the holder of a warrant of one hundred and sixty acres wishes to enter an eighty acre reserved tract—the minimum price of which is two dollars and fifty cents per acre—he may do so with his hundred and sixty acre warrant. But if he wishes to enter one hundred and sixty acres of reserved land, then I think it is proper that he should pay to the United States the difference between the value of his warrant at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre and the value of this tract located upon at two dollars and fifty cents per acre. That is the whole object I have in view in offering my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. I think it is unnecessary to explain it any further.

Mr. MASON. The amendment reported by the select committee, I conceive, embraces the same thing that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] desires to accomplish by his amendment. But if it does not make it plain I have no objection to his amendment, and it is a proper one. Those who locate the reserved lands, the minimum price of which is two dollars and fifty cents per acre, should pay the difference to the Government.

I will make a remark in relation to this subject, to show the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL], and those gentlemen who are interesting themselves in the payment of these registers and receivers, and which I hope will satisfy them of the fact, that this bill has not been well digested in the Senate. I have not been upon any land committee, or upon anything connected with public land, but I learn from a source entitled to as high consideration as any of these committees, that there are a number of these land offices that are not useful. The subject of inquiry, then, is, how many shall be abolished? It is said that at those land offices on the Cherokee and Choctaw lands, where the land is worth but a shilling an acre, and the sales would not pay the officers, the compensation is paid out of the public Treasury; but it is believed by those well acquainted with the business—

Mr. BISSELL, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me a remark?

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. BISSELL. If the sales by cash and by warrants are not sufficient to pay the register and receiver, then they get nothing. They get nothing out of the Treasury.

Mr. MASON. I think the gentleman will find himself mistaken; and that these registers and receivers actually get their pay. They are paid out of the Indian annuity. While that poor starving race are not able to obtain a subsistence, you are paying these land registers and receivers, who are selling land of little or no account, and that at a shilling an acre. It is a subject—

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. MASON. The gentleman will excuse me if I do not. There has been eight or ten hours occupied in the advocacy of these claims for payment, and yesterday, when there was only two hours allowed here to debate the subject, gentlemen upon that side of the question were allowed the whole of it. If I had one half hour I could show the House, that this subject requires a complete reorganization, and requires, upon the part of the House and the committee, a rigid reform.

Well, sir, let this subject be referred to a committee of that character composed for that purpose. Let those land offices where there is no business—those offices are sinecures—be discontinued; and let those doing a large amount of business have sufficient pay to employ clerks, and for themselves a fair compensation. Let their labor be proportionate to their salary. Do not, however, defeat this soldiers' bill by loading it with other matters. You talk of the suffering of the land officer. I have from one of my constituents a letter in which he wishes to sell his land warrant of one hundred and sixty acres. He states that he served in the siege of Tripoli; that he was in the battle of Brownstown, and was there wounded; and that he was taken prisoner during this last war, and was imprisoned six months. Afterwards he was wounded at Fort Meigs. Now he is with his wife, old and blind, himself crippled, making a bare subsistence mending shoes. This matter to him is of great importance. The land registers and receivers, receiving $500 a year, can live in abundance and affluence, while these poor soldiers are in beggary for the want of the passage of this bill. You have talked upon this bill year after year; it was discussed at length at the last session, and it has been discussed also at this. These men who claim extra compensation can wait until the poor soldier has been satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman accept the amendment?

Mr. MASON. I have no objection. I will accept it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I inquire if it is in order to strike out that which has been accepted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] and to insert what I send to the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. TAYLOR. I then move to strike out the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and in lieu of it to insert the following:

And provided further, That any person owning such land warrant, or warrants, shall be entitled to use them in payment for any of the public lands now subject to private entry, or which may hereafter be publicly offered for sale, whether held at the rate of $1 25 or $2 50 per acre, paying two acres of land warrant for one acre of land where the same is held for sale at $2 50 per acre.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will not detain the committee by any extended remarks. I am very anxious to vote for the bill as it has come to us from the Senate; and with all respect for the committee, I will suggest to gentlemen, that it seems that we will make slight progress in the public business, unless we come to a vote promptly upon this question, as this bill has been, in fact pending before the House two months, having been introduced upon the 3d day of December. I offer this amendment in conformity to the wishes of some of those whom I have the honor to represent; and I take this occasion to say that I am not in favor of the 3d sections of this bill. That I am in favor of assigning land warrants upon such terms as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe. I am in favor of paying the registers and receivers, as proposed by the Senate, and I think there is very little difference among the majority of members of the committee upon that subject. It is a just and right bill. I presented a petition at the present session, from four gentlemen who hold the offices of registers and receivers in the town in which I live; and I will say to the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] who discussed this question with ability some weeks ago, urging his party to do justice to the Whigs, and as the Democrats would shortly be in power, that justice might be done to the officers coming in—that it is my desire to do equal justice to Democrats and Whigs. I have presented petitions from Democrats, who have held these offices, as well as Whigs, and wish they should be all paid, without reference as to who shall succeed in the coming presidential election. In my opinion, that is a question of great doubt, and not of so much certainty as gentlemen would seem to indicate. The section making land warrants assignable, as sent to us by the Senate, I think is infinitely preferable to anything reported by any committee of this House; and with the proviso, which I have offered, it appears to me will meet the views of gentlemen upon every side. My object is not to exclude those who go to the West from entering lands at $2 50 per acre, so far as their land warrants go. If a man goes to the new States with a one hundred and sixty acre land warrant, let him, if he choose, enter it upon eighty acres of that description of land, and I will not confine him to land subject to private entry. Why not let him enter the land wherever it may be surveyed and offered for sale at specified prices with his land warrant? I would open the whole field for the soldiers of the late war with Great Britain, and others entitled to bounty land, under the acts of Congress, so that the man with his warrant in his hand should stand upon an exact equality with the man who had an equal amount of gold and silver in his possession. No man has advanced to the committee any argument against it. I cannot say, Mr. Chairman, how far I shall be willing to go as regards the 4th and 5th sections of the bill. My impression is, that the Senate bill ought to be speedily passed. It is infinitely better than any other that has been presented to us; and so far as I may, I will promote the passage of that bill speedily, because I think we ought to press the public business.

Mr. HALL. I have only a word or two to say in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. I think, if the gentleman will consider his amendment attentively, he will find that under it an individual would not be permitted to pay the difference between his land warrant and the value of the land upon which he enters, with cash. He would only be permitted to pay the difference between the warrant and the land upon which it is located with other warrants. Whereas, under the amendment I submitted, which was accepted by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] an individual who locates a warrant upon these reserved sections of land can pay the difference between the price of the land and his warrant with cash. The objection I have, therefore, to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] is, that it will not allow individuals locating upon reserved lands with land warrants to pay the difference with cash, rather than other land warrants.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think it has that tendency. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR, and it was rejected.

The question was then put upon the amendment of Mr. MASON, and it was adopted.

Mr. MASON. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise and report the bill cannot be received while members have amendments to offer.

Mr. SCHOONMAKER moved to amend the first section by adding thereto the following, viz:

And that all warrants for military bounty lands which have been or may hereafter be issued under any law of the United States, and which shall not have been assigned, pledged, mortgaged, or located, may be surrendered to the United States by the original owner, or in case of his death, by his widow, or next of kin, who may be legally entitled to the same by delivering such warrant to the Commissioner of Pensions of the United States, accompanied with proof by affidavit, or otherwise, to the satisfaction of such Commissioner, of the identity and title to the warrant of the person claiming to make such surrender; and that such warrant, or the lands or moneys to be realized therefrom, have not been and are not assigned, transferred, pledged, or mortgaged to any person or corporation, for any purpose whatever, and hath not been located. And upon the surrender being thus made, the person so surrendering such warrant shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for the number of acres specified in the warrant so surrendered.

Mr. S. said: This bill proposes to make land warrants assignable, and to annul the provisions contained in the original bill prohibiting their transfer. That provision was originally inserted to protect the soldiers from land speculators and brokers, and to prevent the Government bounty from inuring more to the benefit of that class of operators than to the soldiers themselves. The object and intent was good, but, unfortunately, the bounty to be received lies upon our western borders, so far distant from the soldiers of the Eastern, Middle, and some of the Northern and Southern States, that the expenses of a journey to locate or visit the land, are nearly, if not quite equal to its cash value. The warrant, therefore, to them is worth but little, while to the citizen of the West living in the vicinity of the land upon which he can locate, its value is fully equal to that of the land. This, consequently, produces a great disparity in the operation of the bill upon the objects of its bounty, which is in no respect ameliorated by making the warrants assignable. For the practical effect of that is to enable land brokers and speculators to procure valid transfers, and legal titles to the warrants, at their own prices and for a mere trifle. Thereby, in truth and effect, the land broker and speculator becomes the recipient of the Government bounty, and not the soldier, and thousands upon thousands of acres of the public lands are thus, under pretence of rewarding the defenders of the country's rights and honor, squandered upon brokers and speculators, whose patriotism consists alone in amassing wealth for themselves. This cannot be the intent of the framers of the act, and it is our duty, if possible, to obviate the difficulty.

Another difficulty incident to the bill in its present shape, is connected with its ultimate injurious influence upon the Western States and Territories. Most of the warrants issued to the inhabitants of the Eastern, Middle, and Southern States being thrown into market, as a necessary consequence will fall into the possession of land brokers and speculators, and thus centralize in few hands. Large tracts of land will then be entered and located by such holders; the soil of almost entire States and Territories will thereby fall into the hands of a few, and such section of the country will have entailed upon it the curse of a large landed monopoly. We of the North have witnessed the evils resulting from such a state of things, and I for one cannot conscientiously vote to entail the same difficulties upon that or any other section of the Union.

Are you, gentlemen of the West, sincerely desirous of reducing the price of the western unoccupied lands to actual settlers? If you are, then do not throw, as you will by passing the bill in its present shape, the mass of the warrants into speculators hands, and give them the control of nearly all the present available lands, because you must thereby inevitably increase the price to meet the fancy and cupidity of the holder, and no lands will be in market at Government prices except those beyond the large locations made under such warrants. No law should be permitted to operate thus unequally upon citizens it is designed to benefit, nor so injuriously upon any section of the country.

The amendment proposed by me will, I think, in a great measure obviate the difficulty. It provides a fair equivalent from the Government, which the soldier has the option to take, and thus places a valuation upon the warrant, and prevents the land speculator and broker from regulating its value and monopolizing the market. It enables the soldier of every section of the Union to receive,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1852.

NEW SERIES.... No. 31.

if he desires not the land, a fair equivalent for his warrant, and places them all on an equal footing. Are not the soldiers whose homes are at the East, entitled to the same emoluments as those at the West? Do they not equally deserve the Government favor and bounty? Have they not also periled their lives in battle, and endured the hardships of war and the camp? Why, then, draw and maintain such an inequality in compensation as the original bill and the one now under consideration will effectually produce? Sir, it will not do. Justice to the deserving recipient of the Government bounty from the Eastern, Southern, and Middle States, and duty to the West, require the adoption of some such amendment as I have proposed.

Mr. SWEETSER. I rise to oppose this amendment, for the reason that I am satisfied with the first section of this bill as amended by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Mason.] It is well known by all those who advocated this bill in the last Congress, that this question in relation to the assignment of these warrants was duly considered, and rejected in consequence of the numerous frauds practiced under the Mexican bill. It is well known, that a vast number of the Mexican warrants have been suspended, and the difficulties growing out of the sale and transfer by the said warrants, induced the original friends of the law of September, 1850, giving bounty lands to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and the Indian wars from 1790 down, to so frame that law as to secure to the soldier the full benefit of the law. Such is my judgment now, while I yield, reluctantly, to the petitions of the people only so far as to make the warrants assignable, and beyond that I will not with my vote go. I am fearful that this measure has been superinduced by the speculators, and is not the spontaneous movement of the holders of the warrants.

I am now, and always have been, opposed to throwing these warrants into the market as a medium of speculation. I desire the old soldier, his widow, and minor children to enjoy this bounty of the Government.

I call upon the members who were responsible for this measure in its origin, to stand by to-day, and assist in striking down every attempt to fasten upon the proposition to make these warrants assignable, other provisions, which are entirely unworthy of the occasion. This mode of tacking on to a popular proposition other measures, which are of questionable merit, and making the simple proposition of making warrants assignable a pack-horse, to carry a load, which must ultimately defeat the wishes of our constituents, is so objectionable, that I must be permitted to declare, that if the attempt succeeds, I shall feel constrained to vote against the whole bill.

If the registers and receivers have performed services for which they get no compensation under the law as it stands, let their friends bring forward a bill for their relief, and trust to the justice and generosity of Congress to pass it, and not attempt to load this bill. The suggestion that these officers will resign, and the public service thereby suffer, has no terrors for me. I can inform the western gentlemen who seem willing to hazard this bill unless they can ingraft upon it a section for the relief of said officers, that they receive five hundred dollars salary from the Government, which is more than an average of what is paid in the West to their recorders and auditors of counties, which offices command the most respectable talent in the country.

It is suggested that these registers and receivers have been speculating in these land warrants. Their knowledge of the lands in their districts has afforded them ample opportunities to have done so. I do not know how it is.

I ask my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. Bissell,] and other gentlemen who acted with me originally upon this question, to aid in striking down all amendments and additions to the first section as amended, and let that section pass through the committee and the House, and become the law of the land. If this bill is to be made the scape-goat to carry through objectionable measures, the responsibility of its defeat will rest upon those gentlemen that have urged with so much pertinacity the other and objectionable propositions which have no legitimate connection with the measure which this House is called upon to pass, and that without delay.

The people have asked us to make these land warrants assignable. The officers ask us to give them compensation for what they have done, and what they may be called upon to do in future. It may be that they are entitled to it. Of that we will judge at the proper time.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Schoonmaker's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out all after the first section, leaving the first section, with the amendment adopted by this committee. I hope the committee will vote upon that proposition as a test question. If it be voted down, then they can go on and perfect the balance of the bill, as the majority may think it should be. I trust the committee will take the vote upon that motion, and let us test the question whether this committee is willing merely to pass so much of that bill as provides for the assignability of these warrants—for that is what is required and demanded of Congress by the holders and beneficiaries of these warrants. The Senate, when we passed the bill of September 28th, 1850, made an amendment preventing their assignability; but it was passed through this House at the last hour of the session, in the midst of noise and confusion, when it was not known by the House that such an amendment was in the bill. We passed at the last session of Congress an act to make these warrants assignable. The Senate loaded it down with amendments, and returned it here; but it was lost again for want of time. At this session we have sent them another bill to make these warrants assignable, and they referred it to a committee; which committee has retained it; and they send another bill of their own originating, and attempt to force it through with all the extraneous matters and provisions appended to it.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hand of their Secretary, ASBURY DICKINS, Esq.]

Mr. JONES resumed. I have but very little more to say about this matter. I understand, though, that the Senate are ready, if we will not pass this bill with all these provisions, to pass the one we have heretofore sent them, merely making land warrants assignable. I hope that the committee will now take the question upon this motion, and test the question, whether we will pass all these measures or not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] is not in order, as I shall attempt to show to the Chair; for if it were, it would then be in order for any gentleman to call for a division of the question, and have a vote taken upon each one of these sections. That would virtually preclude motions to amend, and prevent each individual from advocating the amendment he offers in a five minutes speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the motion to strike out brings under consideration the remaining sections, and it would be in order to amend any one of them before the vote is taken upon the proposition to strike out.

Mr. STEPHENS. The usual rule, when a bill is under consideration, is to act upon each section separately. I will address whatever I have to say in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.] I prefer that we should go through this bill by sections separately; and while I concur in the remarks made by the gentleman for the most part, yet there are sections of the bill I should like to see retained. I prefer that we should take the vote directly upon striking out this second section, and then go on and finish the others. I think the gentleman is perfectly correct in his remarks as to what has been obstructing the passage of this bill for two years, or nearly eighteen months. The whole of it grows out of such opposition as is made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Bissell]—that is, if we do not permit this bill, making warrants assignable, to be ridden down by this provision, allowing registers and receivers an extra compensation for work, the bill shall never pass.

Now, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] announces that as the intention on the part of the friends of these registers and receivers in this House, I, for one, bid them defiance; and I wish this House to know, and the majority to show to the country, that we are not to be bullied by any such threats. If the gentleman comes and says that the Senate will never pass it without such a provision, I shall, for one, join issue upon that.

Mr. BISSELL. I have made no threats. I have said, as any gentleman has a right to do, that if the pay to the registers and receivers were stricken out, I should vote against the bill. Call you this threatening?

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman said, and notified the House, and gives us warning, that the Senate would not pass the bill unless these registers and receivers were paid. I do call that a threat to the House of Representatives; and I call upon the majority of this House, the representatives of the people, to vindicate their own dignity and vote according to their judgments. My opinion is, that the pay of these registers and receivers ought not to be increased. They accepted these offices at a stipulated salary. They come here and ask for these situations, and then they come and demand extra pay for doing that which is a part of the duties of the offices.

The CHAIRMAN. Is an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair, that a motion to strike out all but the first section of the bill is in order? If not, amendments are now in order to the sections proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. DUNHAM. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist on his point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not. I am willing that the amendment shall be received.

Mr. DUNHAM then moved to strike out the second section of the Senate bill, as follows, viz:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the registers and receivers of the land offices shall hereafter be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services in locating all military bounty land warrants, issued since the eleventh day of February, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, the same compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the said compensation to be hereafter paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants where they have been transferred under the provisions of any act of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office; and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the warrant was located by the soldier or warrantee, or his next of kin, as provided for by law—

And insert in lieu thereof the second section of the bill reported by the select committee of the House, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall each be entitled to receive fifty cents for his services in locating each bounty land warrant, to be paid by the person or persons locating the same; but this act shall not be so construed as to allow any register or receiver to receive any greater maximum of salary and fees than by law he is now entitled.

Mr. D. said: It does strike me that the course pursued by the friends of that section of the Senate bill, is a very singular one. After a discussion of two whole days in favor of the Senate bill, without a single speech in opposition to it, and when they knew that the facts were here prepared to be laid before the House, they voted en masse to prevent a single word being said in opposition to their bill and in favor of the other proposition. They ask the committee now to vote on an important bill which, I could satisfy the committee in five words, will involve an expenditure of $2,000,000, without hearing the matters which could be urged in opposition to it.

Now, in regard to the amount of money that will be already due to these officers if this Senate bill passes, I have the figures here, and they show that it will amount to about $200,000. As was shown by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRENTON] yesterday, the cash value of the warrants already located, is about $12,000,000, and it is proposed to pay one per cent. upon that sum to the registers and one per cent. to the receivers. Calculate for yourselves, and you will find that that makes something like $250,000. Take off the fifty cents already received as fees, and it leaves something more than $200,000 to be paid for warrants already located. It is then proposed to go on and pay in the same ratio for the location of warrants in future, and the warrants issued under the act of 1850 will be much more numerous than the warrants issued under the Mexican bounty land law. And yet you are called upon to vote upon that proposition without hearing the facts that might be urged in opposition to it!

It is said that these registers and receivers are not properly paid. Now I ask gentlemen to tell the committee what the receivers have to do in the location of bounty land warrants, that you should pay them $2 for the location of each warrant for one hundred and sixty acres.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office, in which he states that they have to perform almost nothing in locating these warrants, for doing which it is proposed to pay them $2 each. I have not time to read the letter now, but I intend that it shall be published, at some proper time. I ask, if the fifty cents proposed to be paid by the bill of the select committee is not amply sufficient? The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CLARK], who made a speech the other day, said that it was not sufficient, and he read an extract from a letter from one of his constituents, the register or receiver in the land office at Dubuque. That letter states, that in two weeks there were something like one thousand warrants located, and that it required three competent clerks to perform the labor. Well, that would make twenty-seven warrants a day located by each clerk, for which they would each receive $13 50 a day, and yet they say they are not paid ample compensation for the labor they perform! These facts the gentleman from Iowa stated to the House from the letter of his constituent. I ask, are you prepared to vote this bill through in such a state of facts?

Mr. CLARK. They did not get the compensation.

Mr. DUNHAM. It may be possible that they have not received pay for the location of all those warrants; but if the substitute proposed by the select committee passes, they will receive it in such cases as that, and it is ample compensation for the labor they perform—especially when you take into consideration the statement of the Commissioner of the Land Office in this letter, that those receivers do comparatively no labor at all.

Mr. BISSELL. I am opposed to this amendment; and there is one fact to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee. These land officers are not equally paid. If the honorable chairman of the select committee proposes to reduce the salaries of the land officers, let him introduce a bill which shall effect that object, doing equal justice to all, and I will probably go with him, for I am as much in favor of low salaries as he is. But when you ask me to pass a law which will have the effect of giving to one man four dollars for services which another man has to perform for one dollar, you must excuse me if I say I cannot do it, and you may call it a threat if you please.

Under the operation of the law as it now stands, some of the land officers do four times as much labor as others, and do not get more than one fourth as much pay; because, in certain land offices, nearly all the entries are made with warrants, while in others most of the entries are made with cash, upon which the officers get their percentage. If the gentleman proposes to reduce their salaries, let him do it systematically, regularly, and legitimately—equalize them all, and then see if we do not all go with him. But when you propose to compensate certain officers for certain labor, why will you cut off other officers who have to perform the same labor, from receiving the same compensation?

I wish to call the attention of the committee to another fact, and that is, that in no case under this law, could any officer receive any more than he was authorized to receive before these bounty land bills passed. Under these laws, the land officers have had a great deal more labor to perform, and, in no event, under the law which we now propose to pass, can any of them receive a greater amount of pay than the law authorized him to receive before the bounty land laws were passed.

I believe that if you strike out these most important and essential provisions of this bill, it is lost—not only lost in this House, but I am still more convinced that it is lost in the Senate.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let it go, then.

Mr. BISSELL. Ay! "let it go, then," says the gentleman. Yes, if this darling scheme of his—this bill introduced by him from the select committee—a bill incongruous, unintelligible, and unexplainable—cannot pass, it must all go. I will not call it a nonsensical bill, as a member near me says—

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. BISSELL. I cannot; I have not time.

Mr. DUNHAM. I want to ask the gentleman—[Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman introduced the bill, and forthwith moved an amendment to it himself. He introduced a bill which proposed to repeal a proviso in a former law, when there was no such proviso in that law to be repealed. He made several mistakes of equal importance, and now because that heterogeneous bill cannot pass, the whole scheme must be defeated!

I repeat, that I believe this bill, if amended as the gentleman from Indiana proposes to amend it, cannot pass the Senate. I do not believe that it can pass this House. I know that if thus amended, I should be constrained to vote against it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] wrought himself up to the pitch of calling that "a threat." If other members regard it so, I shall be surprised indeed to learn it. I expressed the opinion that it could not pass the Senate; the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], on the other hand, says he has good reason to know that it can pass that body. I stated that if the bill was so amended, I should vote against it; the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM], say they shall vote against it unless it is so amended. So the "threat" and "bullying" seem to be pretty much on one side as well as on the other. Besides that, I suppose the House has heard too often from the gentleman from Georgia and from myself to be very much alarmed at anything we might say.

Mr. FITCH moved to strike out of the second section of Senate bill all after the word "warrants" in the tenth line, as follows, viz:

—"where they have been transferred under the provision of any act of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office; and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the warrant was located by the soldier or warrantee, or his next of kin, as provided for by law."

He said the amendment was made, not because he esteemed its adoption very essential, though proper, but to enable him to call the attention of the committee to the ridiculous blunder perpetrated by his colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM] in moving to strike out the entire second section and insert other matter identical in principle with that proposed to be stricken out. His [Mr. DUNHAM's] argument was directed not against the section he proposes to strike out, but against the third section which his motion does not propose to disturb! This blunder is only another of the series committed by the gentleman as chairman of the select committee to which the House bill on this subject was referred, and which reported back the deformity, a portion of which it is now proposed to adopt in lieu of the Senate bill.

There were often (Mr. F. said) more false facts than false theories adduced here in support of a measure. His colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] was dealing largely in the former. The very letter to which he referred but a few minutes since, to sustain his declaration that receivers had nothing to do in locating warrants, states the very reverse; and in his (Mr. F.'s) hand was now a letter from the same source (Commissioner of the General Land Office) stating in detail the duties of receivers in such locations. To his colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] must be yielded the palm so far for blundering legislation—a character of legislation to which the past may justify us in expecting a climax by the introduction as a substitute for the bill before us, of some matter upon another and wholly irrelevant subject.

He (Mr. F.) had before said his proposed amendment was not, in his estimation, highly important, and made by him for a purpose now fulfilled; but the amendment was proper, as it will leave the fees in every case to be paid by the holder of the warrant, and in no case out of the Treasury.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am opposed to the amendment. I am very much obliged to my colleague [Mr. FITCH] for the very courteous manner with which he has been pleased to speak of me upon this occasion, as well as the other day. I think, however, that if he will examine he will find that he has committed just as egregious blunders in this matter as I have. The section which I propose to strike out is as different from the one which I propose to insert, as it can be. So much for the courtesy of my colleague.

I have one word in relation to the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.] That gentleman has seen fit to charge me, as chairman of the select committee, with altering the bill reported from that committee. I deny it. There has not been a single proposition in any section of that bill which has been altered, even in phraseology, in the least; and I appeal to every member of that committee to sustain me in the assertion.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me one word?

Mr. DUNHAM. You will have time to reply afterwards.

Mr. BISSELL. I must be allowed to say that the gentleman is wholly mistaken in what he says.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I simply say this: The members of that committee are present, and can bear witness whether what I say is correct or not. I undertake to say that there was scarcely a controversy upon any section of the bill, except in reference to the first and second sections. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] voted against me upon the second section, and, as a matter of course, he did in reference to the first.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the gentleman to say if I ever consented that land warrants should be located without regard to the price?

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he ever, in committee, proposed an amendment to obviate that difficulty? He did not; and I apprehend he did not discover the blunder any more than I did. It does not become him, as a member of that committee, to charge me with blunders which escaped his notice as well as mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot permit this kind of discussion to go on. It is all out of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. Does the gentleman from Illinois pretend to say here that I altered that bill after it was reported by the committee?

Mr. BISSELL. Not knowingly. Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot permit this discussion to go on. The Chair calls the gentlemen to order.

Mr. BISSELL. I must be permitted to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. DUNHAM. Certainly, I will permit the gentleman; and desire that he should answer my question.

Mr. BISSELL. I refer particularly to that portion of the bill which authorizes that land warrants shall be received in payment for the public lands, without regard to the price of those lands. My understanding of it was, that warrants should be received in payment for the public lands, but that the lands should be held at their nominal value—say $2 50 per acre. The bill, as introduced, authorizes the holder of the warrant—for instance, the holder of a one hundred and sixty acre warrant—to locate it on lands held at $2 50 per acre.

Mr. DUNHAM. Oh, I understand that. But I do not remember that the matter was mooted in the committee. And if it was, I stand here to say that the original bill, as it was submitted to the committee at its last sitting, is the same which was introduced here. The bill was laid before the committee and examined critically—examined by us all. It was sent from the committee room directly to the printing office, and the manuscript can be examined there. It was printed and sent here; yet now, forsooth, the gentleman from Illinois comes here and charges the blunders in the bill upon the unfortunate chairman of the committee, who, as the committee know, did his utmost to perfect it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEBARD. I desire to ask if it is in order to ask for a division of the question on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] so that it shall first be taken upon striking out?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I will ask to have the amendment to the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. As the amendment to the amendment is an unimportant one, the Chair will suggest that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] withdraw it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I regard the amendment as one of some importance.

Mr. KING, of New York. By a rule of the House, the amendment cannot be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware that it cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object. I would inquire if the question is not on the proposition to strike out the whole of the second section?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] moves to strike out the whole of the second section of the Senate bill, [as reported above,] and to insert the second section of the bill reported from the select committee in lieu thereof; and his colleague [Mr. Fitch] moves to strike out that portion of the second section of the Senate bill, as follows, viz:

—“where they have been transferred under the provisions of any act of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office; and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the warrant was located by the soldier or warrantee, or his next of kin, as provided for by law.”

The question is now on striking out the portion of the section which has just been read.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon striking out the entire section of the Senate bill and inserting the second section of the bill proposed by the select committee, as reported above.

Mr. BRENTON. I offer the following amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out from the section proposed to be inserted, the words “by him located,” and to insert in lieu thereof the words “of forty acres, and $2 for each warrant of one hundred and sixty acres.” So that it will provide that the registers and receivers shall be entitled to receive fifty cents for each land warrant of forty acres, and $2 for each warrant of one hundred and sixty acres which they may locate.

Mr. B. said: If the amendment of my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] should prevail, the amendment which I have proposed to it must address itself at once to the intelligence of every man in this committee. I hold that our laws should be equal, and that we should not be called upon to pass laws which do not place the poor man upon the same equality with the rich man. What is the effect of the section as it now stands? It is that the man who has been enabled to raise $50 and purchased a land warrant shall be compelled to pay for the location of his warrant as much as the man who has a $200 warrant shall pay for locating his. I am not prepared to sanction any such doctrine; and I am satisfied that my colleague, when he looks at the question, will not advocate his own amendment without the insertion of such a provision as I have indicated. Gentlemen will see at once that it requires a man who has his warrant for forty acres to pay four times as much in proportion to its value, as the man who has his one hundred and sixty acre warrant. It says that the man with the one hundred and sixty acre warrant shall pay fifty cents, but I am opposed to compelling the poor man, who, by his hard earnings, has been enabled to purchase a warrant for forty acres, to pay a similar sum. Now, I am for compelling the rich man to pay the same for the privilege he enjoys, as the poor man, and the amendment which I have proposed will effect that purpose. It places them upon precisely the same footing. One per cent. upon the cash sale of forty acres will amount to about fifty cents, and one per cent. for the cash sale of one hundred and sixty acres will be about $2. This amendment, therefore, places the purchasers of the one hundred and sixty acre warrants, and the purchasers of forty acre warrants upon the same footing.

I now desire to answer some of the objections urged by my colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM,] in reference to the expense which will be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this bill. I think I shall be able to show that they will not amount to anything like the extravagant sum which he indicates. I am of the opinion that any calculations which bring the expense above $100,000 are not in accordance with the facts of the case. I stated in my remarks on yesterday, that the price of all these warrants was about $12,000,000. Now, divide one per cent. of that amount between one hundred and thirty-six men, and you will be enabled to ascertain what amount it would give to each individual for the five years past. Then from that amount is to be deducted what the officers have received after the law of 1848. I am not prepared to say what is the precise amount, and I have made calculations on the subject, but they are not before me. I think, however, that the whole percentage on the sum will amount to a little over $100,000. From this is to be deducted the receipts of these officers under the law of 1848, so that it reduces, according to my calculation, to less than $100,000.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think I understood my colleague to say that the whole price of these warrants was $12,000,000.

Mr. BRENTON. Certainly.

Mr. DUNHAM. And that two per cent. is payable to the receivers and registers?

Mr. BRENTON. Certainly—one per cent. to each of these officers.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I would like to know how the gentleman can make the amount of percentage $100,000? It is $240,000.

Mr. BRENTON. Well, I give the gentleman the figures as they appear upon the report, and every gentleman can make his calculations to suit himself.

Mr. J. W. HOWE. My constituents are interested in the passage of the first section; and I merely wish to say that I am in favor of passing it. It provides that land warrants shall be assignable. As to all the remainder of the bill I am opposed to it. I wish to make this remark, that I may appear fairly upon the record. I believe it is expedient to pass a law that shall make land warrants assignable, and my constituents require that I shall so vote; but to all the rest of the bill I am entirely opposed.

As respects land officers not being compensated, I will merely say to them, as I would to members of Congress, if your compensation is not sufficient you may resign. Whenever a Congressman finds that his wages are not ample and sufficient he resigns his seat; and I suppose that a receiver or land officer might do the same thing.

In regard to western lands, I would remark that I consider the northern, or the old original thirteen States, as having no interest, or lot, or part, in them. It is a western and local question altogether. I am satisfied, from what I have seen in this House, and from all past experience of legislation upon public lands, that the old thirteen States can never get enough of them to make a Pottersfield of—never enough to bury their dead upon. The public lands are gone, irrevocably gone, from the old States. I am for making the best disposition of them under the circumstances. I am not in favor of giving bounty lands. I am for giving to every actual settler, who will go and remain upon the land, one hundred and sixty acres. I would this day vote for giving every acre away in that manner. I am entirely opposed to giving them to soulless corporations, upon a promise that they will make railroads or anything of that kind. They must go to the States to which they belong. I know that Pennsylvania can get none of them. I know the old States can get none of them. I am in favor of giving them out in parcels to individuals who will go and occupy and husband the lands, and make them valuable, and enhance the value of the property of the States to which they belong.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask my colleague to correct a word. He said he was willing to give the lands to the States to which they belong. I know my colleague did not mean to express himself in that way.

Mr. HOWE. I mean to give them to actual settlers who will occupy them, in the States where the lands are situated, and not to soulless corporations.

Mr. ALLISON. So I supposed.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. BRENTON to the amendment of Mr. DUNHAM, and it was lost.

The question then recurring upon the amendment of Mr. DUNHAM.—

Mr. BISSELL said: I desire to have the second section of the Senate bill read as now amended.

The second section as amended was read.

Mr. SACKETT. I propose to amend the second section of the Senate bill by striking out the words “the same compensation or percentage to ‘which they are entitled by law for sales of the ‘public lands for cash, at the rate of $1 25 per ‘acre, the said compensation to be hereafter paid ‘by the assignees or holders of such warrants ‘where they have been transferred under the provisions of an act of Congress, and the regulations ‘of the General Land Office,’ and insert ‘eighty cents,’ and after the word ‘paid’ in the thirteenth line, insert ‘in all cases where a warrant has been assigned, and in all other cases to be paid.’”

The CHAIRMAN. A portion of the section to which the amendment refers, has already been stricken out.

Mr. SACKETT. I will then modify the amendment, so that the effect of it will be to strike out all that part of the section which is based upon the idea of giving compensation to registers and receivers, and insert instead thereof the words ‘eighty cents.’ I am in favor of giving a specific compensation for the location of land warrants, and the sum I propose is eighty cents. There seems to be an opinion on the part of a large portion of the House that this compensation, by way of percentage, is too high, and that it amounts in the case of a one hundred and sixty acre warrant, to $2, and in the case of eighty acres, to $1, paid to the registers and receivers, which, in my judgment, is too high a compensation. It is for the simple reason that I do not suppose that the general law specifies a higher compensation than is proper, but yet that, in case of these land warrants which are generally located in parcels, and large numbers by individuals, speculators, and agents, the compensation should not be as much as for locating an individual purchase made for cash, that I have offered this compromise price of eighty cents for locating these warrants.

My other proposition, if I may be permitted to allude to it, was made in order that the soldiers themselves might have their warrants located, and the compensation therefor be paid out of the Treasury, but that in case the warrants reached the hands of an assignee, the compensation should be paid by the holder. That was the intention. I have no idea that these receivers should do the business for nothing; and certainly a few of the receivers should not be required to do all the business of our public lands during the time these warrants are locating; for substantially these warrants increase the business of the public land offices, and therefore I think a proper compensation should be awarded to the receivers under such circumstances. I think eighty cents is not far out of the way.

Mr. BISSELL. The second section of the Senate bill, as now amended, provides that in all cases where locations are hereafter made, two per cent. shall be paid by the person holding the warrant, whether he be the assignee or the original holder. I think that is right. I think that the holder of the warrant, whoever he may be, whether he is the old soldier or the old soldier's assignee, should be willing, and I know they are willing in every instance, to pay whatever is fair and reasonable for locating their warrants. It is not too much to ask of any man, if you give him one hundred and sixty or forty acres of land, that in the one case he shall pay $2, and in the other fifty cents for making out his papers. It is not unreasonable, and no one will complain of it.

Mr. AVERETT, (interrupting.) I understand that in order for any one to get the floor he must have an amendment to offer or he must speak in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is speaking to an amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. I am speaking to an amendment, and I am in favor of this second section of the Senate bill as it now stands. It requires, in all cases, that the holder of a warrant, whether he be the assignee or the soldier himself, shall pay for locating the land; and shall pay precisely as much, and no more, than is paid when the location is made with cash. If I take two hundred dollars in gold to the land office and propose to enter one hundred and sixty acres of land, two dollars of that two hundred goes to compensate the register and receiver.

Mr. SACKETT, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman answer me a question. The phraseology of the bill is, "the same compensation or percentage;" I wish to know if there is any other compensation besides percentage?

Mr. BISSELL. None whatever; that is mere verbiage. If I take two hundred dollars in gold to a land office to enter one hundred and sixty acres, two dollars of that gold, as I before said, go to pay the register and receiver. Under this section as now amended, if I take a one hundred and sixty acre warrant I pay the same, whereas in fact the labor of the register and receiver is, in this latter case, more than four times as great as when an entry is made with cash.

Mr. DUNHAM. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information. Where the entry is made in cash does the man who makes the entry have to pay it?

Mr. BISSELL. I did not say so at all. I said that of the two hundred dollars two dollars go to the register and receiver—of course out of the Treasury of the United States. But under this section, when the holder of a warrant enters his land, he must, as he ought to do—the land being given to him—pay that little pittance. Who can object to that Senate bill now? It takes no money out of the Treasury, and only requires a man to whom you have given one hundred and sixty acres of land to pay two dollars for its location. Who can object to it? Who will have it struck out for this much less intelligible amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana? [Mr. DUNHAM.] This is a simple, plain, straightforward matter. I hope the second section, as now amended, and that does not take a dollar from the Treasury, but only requires the holder of a warrant to pay as much as would be paid to the register and receiver if the entry was made in cash, will remain as it is, and that it will become a part of the law.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. SACKETT, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. AVERETT. Is it in order to strike out all of the second section?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion is pending to strike out all after the first section, and also to strike out the second section.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer the follow proviso to the second section, as it now stands:

Provided, That no fees shall be charged where the warrant was located by the original warrantee.

Mr. M. I conceive the second section to be as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] understands it, that it will require the soldier to pay to the registers and receivers two per cent. on the amount of his warrant, and to that I am opposed, because the bounty land law was based upon the idea that it was a gratuity upon the part of the Government to the men who had rendered military service; and I am unwilling to change the principle of the law, so as to charge the soldier where he makes the entry, with any fee at all. I would require of the registers and receivers gratuitous services, at all events, where this class of persons locate warrants. I am fully aware that it may be replied to this, that the speculator will charge upon the market value of the warrant whatever he may be required to pay in the Land Office, that that is an evil which unavoidably accompanies the subject, which may depress the value of the warrant, and which will, at all events, operate as a sort of tax upon the assignability of land warrants. I am opposed to the principle of the amendment which is attempted to be inserted here by our own committee, and prefer the basis of percentage as a compensation, rather than a fixed amount, for the location of land warrants, for the simple reason, that as you fix the basis of compensation according to the warrant, it operates to the depreciation in market of the forty acre warrant most, the eighty acre warrant next, and the one hundred and sixty acre warrant last, and therefore operates the largest tax upon the smallest warrant. The man having a warrant for the least number of acres will be taxed the most. If I go into market to buy land warrants, I will prefer one of one hundred and sixty acres to forty acre warrants; and why? Because I would have to pay only one fourth the tax in locating a one hundred and sixty acre warrant, that I would have to pay for the forty acre warrants.

Mr. BISSELL. Not at all. Under this section, to locate a forty acre warrant you pay fifty cents, to locate an eighty acre warrant you pay $1, and to locate a one hundred and sixty acre warrant you pay $2.

Mr. MARSHALL. That is the percentage. I am expressing my opposition to the provision of the House bill, which proposes to fix the compensation for locating warrants at a specific sum. I have not much to say, and I will not trouble the House by entering into the discussion. This matter has got now to about the point where I expected it would get when we referred it to a select committee. I think we were then a little further advanced than now. I am now expressing my opposition to the matter which it is intended hereafter to be inserted. It is as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall each be entitled to receive fifty cents for his services, in locating each bounty land warrant by him located, to be paid by the person or persons locating the same.

That is, no matter whether it is a forty, eighty, or one hundred and sixty acre warrant, they will charge fifty cents upon each. This will depreciate the small warrants and appreciate the large ones.

Mr. EVANS. I intend to oppose the proposition, and in doing so, to make some remarks in reference to the extent of land warrants, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BRENTON.] It was stated by the gentleman, and assented to by his colleague, that $12,000,000 would cover the entire issue of land warrants. Well, that may be so. But a certain official report makes a different statement; I do not propose to decide where doctors disagree, nor to determine between gentlemen equally well informed, but I will ask the committee to undertake that task after hearing what I am about to read. I hold in my hand an official document of this Government—Executive document, No. 11, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the second session of the 31st Congress. There is a statement appended to this report—statement K—to which I would ask the attention of the gentleman from Indiana, whose account I do not gainsay. The Secretary says, "Statement K, appended to this report, shows the number of warrants located by the acts to which reference has been made, and the number yet to be located, as estimated from the pay rolls and other evidences on file, with the quantity of lands in acres required to satisfy them." The quantity of lands sold and taken from market by virtue of these warrants, for the years 1847, 1848, 1849, is 14,727,742.40 acres (averaging 4,909,247.46 acres per annum), valued at $18,911,134.76; (averaging $6,303,711.58 per annum.)

"The warrants yet to be presented under these acts will require 78,922,513 acres, valued at $98,653,140. At the above average of 4,909,247.46 acres per annum over sixteen years will be required to absorb and satisfy the warrants yet to be issued, as estimated under the several bounty land acts now in force.

"There will then be diverted from the Treasury, from the sale of lands, the sum of $113,245,896."

Now from this $113,245,896 is to be deducted $25,981,671, the value of the swamp lands granted to the State of Louisiana; $133,600, the value of lands granted to colleges, salines, &c.; and $2,450,314, granted for internal improvements and Choctaw certificates; which would leave $80,888,021, the value of lands granted under the several bounty land acts. The Secretary says expressly that he has based his computation upon the pay-rolls and upon the number of warrants likely to be brought in—not upon the whole number of soldiers that ever served, but upon those granted to soldiers still living, and the widows and minor children of soldiers who are dead, and those that it is probable will come in. It is not a vague and wild estimate. I would like to know—but not in the limit of my speech, as gentlemen will afterwards have an opportunity of replying—where the twelve millions of dollars came from as the amount upon which the percentage was asked; and I would like to know how the Secretary of the Treasury made a mistake of $80,888,021. I want to know whether $12,000,000 or $80,000,000 is the correct estimate, and I want to know what it will take, at two per cent., if it is $68,000,000, to pay the registers and receivers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRENTON. I move to strike from the amendment the words "original warrantee." I make this motion for the purpose of setting myself right. In the first place, I would inquire of the gentleman from Maryland where he obtained the estimate he has given the committee?

Mr. EVANS. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the second session of the Thirty-first Congress, Executive document No. 11. I will send it to the gentleman.

Mr. BRENTON. I was fully aware of the statement read from that document, but he has misconceived the point which I made. The question is, what amount will be necessary to pay the claims of registers and receivers at the land offices prior to the 3d March, 1849, and for warrants located up to the close of the third quarter of 1851. My estimate is upon sales previous to that time, leaving out of consideration the warrants located subsequently, and yet to be located.

Mr. EVANS. Mine embraced all.

Mr. BRENTON. No gentleman can successfully controvert my position who will look at the facts as I presented them. The question is, what will it take to pay for services heretofore rendered by those turned out of office by the present Administration, and for warrants located up to the time I specified? The report is just as I stated it in my remarks on yesterday—the annual cash value of lands located by warrants up to the third quarter of 1851. That was the amount of lands actually disposed of. To take the warrants which have been issued, and all that are to be issued, has not entered into my calculation at all. I took simply the estimate in the Commissioner's report of actual locations up to a given time, and not of those in circulation.

Mr. EVANS. I understand the gentleman. I took the whole number, the gentleman only takes a part.

Mr. BRENTON. I fixed a certain time, and confined my estimate of the lands actually located within that time, and not of those which have and may be issued under the provisions of law. I am aware the vast amount of warrants authorized to be issued will exhaust millions and millions of acres of public domain. I am satisfied of that. My argument was to show the amount of money that would be drawn from the Treasury as compensation for the services already rendered by the registers and receivers. I still stand by all the facts I have stated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I only wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] As this second section of the Senate bill now stands, the price to be paid to the registers and receivers is one and a quarter per cent. per acre. The gentleman from Indiana moves to insert fifty cents for each warrant. One per cent. upon the value of forty acres is fifty cents. So there is little difference between the section, as it now stands amended, and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. One per cent. upon the whole amount.

Mr. STEPHENS. There is very little difference between them; and so far as I am concerned it is wholly immaterial whether the motion fails or is agreed to. I think the gentleman from Kentucky was mistaken in supposing that it would depreciate the forty acre warrants. I am opposed to paying them anything, and shall vote with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to strike out the whole section.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MARSHALL's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move, pro forma, to amend the second section of the bill, by reducing the proposed pay one half.

I wish particularly to state a few facts to this committee, and then I have done with this part of the subject. It strikes me that these men are generally well paid for their services. It is well known to every member of this committee that both registers and receivers are each paid an annual salary of $500. Besides this, they receive a percentage upon the moneys received upon all cash entries. I will call the attention of the committee to the case of a single land office, as an illustration of the duties performed and the compensation therefor. I will take the land office where the office of register was filled by my honorable colleague, [Mr. BRENTON.] And, by the way, it really seems to me that my colleague shows his great modesty by his exceedingly warm support of this bill, having himself just left a land office which is to be affected by it, and therefore being directly interested. And I know that my colleague is a very candid man, and would do nothing but what he thought strictly right, even in a matter wherein he was himself directly interested; but, sir, it is so very natural for one to work himself into the belief that a thing is right which is for his interest, that I think it would be well for the committee to at least scrutinize the arguments of my colleague closely, for fear that, notwithstanding all his candor, his judgment may be a little warped. Now, sir, our rules prohibit a member from voting upon a measure under such circumstances; and it seems to me that modesty should forbid him from so earnestly advocating it. But that is merely a matter of taste, about which I do not feel particularly interested. The amount of money received at the land office of Fort Wayne, in Indiana, the first quarter of 1850, was $893; the second quarter, $8,528; the third quarter, $7,285; fourth quarter, $6,050; first quarter of 1851, $4,988; second quarter, $529, and the third quarter $559; and so it goes on pretty much in that way. That is the amount of money received into the public Treasury; and for receiving this the officers are entitled to a salary of $500 a year, besides one per cent. upon the amount of money actually received. But he shows you that he has not been well paid in locating these land warrants. Let us see. The whole number of Mexican land warrants located at the Fort Wayne office, from the first issue of those warrants to the present time, is two hundred and forty three. For this extra service, the Government have paid each year $500 to the officer, and besides this, he was entitled to receive, and undoubtedly has received, half a dollar for locating each warrant not located by the original warrantee, and very few, as I have before shown, have been. Yet the gentleman seems to think they have not been well paid. What is true in reference to Fort Wayne, is true in reference to one half of the offices, though at some of the offices much less has been received than at Fort Wayne; at some, in fact, for whole quarters nothing at all has been received. I undertake to say, that a majority of them are paid as much as they ought to be, for the number of land warrants located. I do not believe it is a very great hardship upon them.

Mr. BISSELL. If two hundred land warrants were located there, then the receiver cannot receive as much as $200 under this law, unless they were one hundred and sixty acre warrants. The receiver or register under the law we propose, would not receive from it so much, at any rate no more, than $200. Is not that a great sum? Now, there is the amount the receiver at Fort Wayne is to receive under this law.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is not a very great sum, it is true; but when you put together what we are asked to pay to all these officers for past and present services, it does make, as I have heretofore shown, a very large sum indeed; and if the officer is not deserving of the pay, why should we pay him at all? It is a simple question, whether these services have been properly compensated? Every western man knows, who has any experience in these public offices, that these officers are engaged in other business, and are discharging other duties by no means interfering with the business of these offices.

I know it is said that this $500 salary is for office-rent, fuel, &c., the books, blanks and stationery being furnished by the Government; but, sir, I will appeal to my colleague himself, that it is far more than sufficient for that purpose. I presume very few if any of the offices occupied cost a rent of $100 per annum. I apprehend, then, sir, that the excess of this $500 salary, after paying rent and contingencies, increased by the fee of fifty cents per warrant, proposed by my amendment, will be ample compensation for the labors performed by these officers in locating these warrants.

At the time my colleague was appointed register of the land office at Fort Wayne, a Democrat was turned out to make a place for him. I do not think that Democrat was anxious to be removed because the compensation was inadequate, or for any other reason, and I do think my colleague, as well as several other hungry Whig office seekers, were anxious to be appointed in his place. I never heard that my colleague was disposed to give up the office until he thought there was a chance for him to be elected to a seat on this floor, although he had before that held it ample time to have enabled him to ascertain whether he was sufficiently paid for his labor.

Mr. Chairman, it is seldom you find a man out of office, who desires to hold office at all, who does not believe that the emoluments are ample and desirable; and you as seldom find one in office who believes that he is sufficiently compensated for the great sacrifices which he makes to give to the country the benefit of his services and great talents.

Mr. SWEETSER. I regret exceedingly to interfere with this pleasant episode on the part of the gentleman from Indiana. I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment which has been offered by my honorable friend upon my right, and for the purpose of opposing all amendments to this section. It is not my desire that this section should be made palatable, after the demonstration which has been made here in relation to the details of this bill. It seems to me that the friends of the original proposition—the first section—which makes these land warrants assignable, should cease further debate, and make it a test question, in relation to striking out the second section, which will be fatal to the balance of the bill. I know there was a very decided expression of opinion upon the motion made by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] to strike out the second section. That motion seemed to cover the balance of the bill. There was a demonstration here, that this House was convinced that the original proposition to make these land warrants assignable, should be passed. But in relation to the details of the bill, other propositions were brought in and tacked upon the back of this proposition, which may receive the sanction of the House at a proper time; but the friends of the measure were unwilling to agree to the separate provisions offered, because they were out of place. Now, I say to these gentlemen, however much we may differ in relation to these provisions, let us pass the original proposition. I ask gentlemen desirous of retaining the original proposition, why shall we procrastinate this matter further? Let us come to a test vote upon striking out the second section. That is what we desire. After we come to that vote, then, if there is a majority of the House who decide in favor of striking out, gentlemen who have their different propositions, can bring them forward and submit them to the favorable consideration of Congress. I will vote to give them a special committee, and let the friends of the various propositions have an opportunity of making a favorable showing for their friends.

It is obvious to all that these gentlemen cannot and do not agree among themselves in relation to the details of their favorite propositions. That disagreement of itself furnishes sufficient reason for the House to reject now all the extraneous measures.

It would be unsafe and unwise in the committee to attempt to dispose of these various propositions in the absence of all agreement upon the details, and in the haste which seems to be demanded by the pressing wishes of our constituents. Let us cease offering amendments, bring the committee to a test vote, and yield fairly to the will of the majority of the committee. I do not doubt, neither can gentlemen who differ with me doubt, but it is the wish and intention of this committee to strip this bill of all crude and irrelevant propositions.

I indulge the hope that we may speedily and without further delay, pass the law which is demanded, and in due time give our attention to the various propositions now before the committee, and dispose of each, all, in accordance with justice.

Mr. HENN moved that the committee rise.

The question was then taken, and it was not agreed to.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DUNHAM's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to strike out all after the word "seven," in the sixth line, and insert, "on each land warrant of forty acres, fifty cents; for each land warrant of eighty acres, $1; and for each land warrant of one hundred and sixty acres, $2."

In presenting this amendment, I wish to call the attention of the especial friends of this provision of the bill, to its consideration. I have become satisfied myself that there is a strong disposition in the House against giving to these registers, who have really performed these duties, any compensation whatever. I think that is unjust. I think it would require five or six registers or receivers, and for them to do all this business without any additional compensation whatever, would be unequal and unjust. This proposition is a graduated proposition, based upon the same principle precisely as the percentage principle, only it is half the amount proposed by the original bill itself. That is one per cent. to each of the officers. The effect of this is to give half per cent. to each of them, and it is based upon the proposition of making every grade of warrant equal—a warrant for forty acres paying the same per cent. as a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres, thus steering clear of all the difficulties that have been suggested in regard to that point in the case. If there is anything to be preserved to these men, who really performed these duties, I would suggest to the friends of this provision of the bill, whether it would not be wise to adopt this proposition of half per cent., or a proposition that is equivalent to half per cent., and preserve an equality between all warrants, giving to each register and receiver fifty cents for every forty acre warrant; $1 for every eighty acre warrant, and $2 for every one hundred and sixty acre warrant.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this and all other amendments to the bill. The proposition of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] meets with my hearty concurrence. I trust that we shall speedily come to a vote upon striking out all of this bill but the first section, which makes land warrants assignable, and, of course, available to those who have received them from the Government in acknowledgment of services rendered. I have listened with some attention to this debate, and with a sincere desire to be informed about the details of the bill, but confess that the only part which I fully comprehend is that which provides for the compensation of land officers, as well the incumbents as their predecessors. We hear that the emoluments and salaries are poor and insufficient—that the compensation is utterly inadequate for the services rendered. Sir, I am a plain man and come from a plain people, amongst whom common sense is a marked characteristic. When by the turns of the wheel of fortune an office gets fixed upon a man, and the income is not sufficient for his support, the old people advise him to resign. We are apprised that there is no part of the country where it is lawful to hold a man violently in office. I also remark, that when, in the mutations by which power is transferred from the hands of one party to another, and the incumbents of office are removed, we hear great murmuring amongst those who have been turned out from those unprofitable stations. I now understand the problem. These gentlemen have determined to serve the country from patriotic motives; and when a Democratic President obstructs their high purpose, by removal of Whigs, they have a right to complain. And so when a Whig Executive ejects Democrats from stations, in which they were determined to demonstrate their devotedness to the country, and the country alone, I am not surprised that they give utterance to feelings of dissatisfaction. Above all, sir, I would not go back and vote compensation to those who have been kept from pecuniary sacrifice by a removal from office. No, sir, those who, having determined to throw themselves upon the wave of patriotism and be wafted to honor and immortal fame, should be permitted to win the prize. I would not stain the lustre of their renown by mingling the sordid consideration of filthy lucre, in the shape of back rations, with their claims to our gratitude. It is the warm current of patriotic feeling which determines them to give up all in the self-denying duty of holding office, for, strange to tell, all the offices are filled. There is no lack of patriotic men to meet the necessities of the country. But, sir, let us come up to the duty of making land warrants issued, and in progress of being issued, under an existing law, assignable. Let us not keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope of the soldier, or his widow, whose long-deferred claims are now acknowledged. Let us remove the artificial difficulties placed in the way of a transfer by our own legislation, and which have made many a prey to sharks and speculators. He totters on the verge of the grave; life's sand is nearly run out; let us throw a beam of light upon his dark path; let us cheer him with an assurance of the regard, and the receipt of the bounty of a grateful country, as free from conditions as his services were generous and valuable.

Mr. ALLISON moved to amend Mr. SACKETT's amendment so as to reduce the compensation proposed to be allowed to the registers and receivers to one half.

Mr. A. then said: For one, I would be very willing that the committee should come to a vote at once upon the proposition to make land warrants assignable. That I conceive to be the object of these bills, and that is what those who are interested in these warrants require. I suppose that every gentleman upon this floor represents some who are directly interested in these warrants and are anxious to have them made assignable. We learn this from the fact that among the very first propositions submitted to this House at the commencement of the session, was a proposition to make land warrants assignable. But there are other questions which have been introduced and connected with this subject. I have not time to discuss them now, but my worthy colleague, [Mr. J. W. HOWE,] who addressed the House a short time ago, made use of words which suggested an idea to my mind. He said that the old States had no longer any interest in the lands in the new States and Territories in the western part of the country. Why, sir, it amazed me to hear that the experience of that gentleman, who has held a seat upon this floor for some years, had taught him that the old States had no interest in the public lands, and that those lands ought to be given to those to whom they belonged—to the new States. As a Pennsylvanian, I could not agree to that, nor did I believe that my colleague intended it. I know that the legislation of the last few years would teach us that the old States have no interest in the public lands, but I hope that time is passed away; I hope we shall hear new doctrines and learn that the old States have a common interest in these lands, and that they are a common fund for the benefit of all the States.

Mr. J. W. HOWE. I did not mean to say that the old States had no interest in the lands. I meant to say that they had an interest in them, but could not put their hands upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. Ah! That may be. But I hope the day has come when a new doctrine is to be taught. I hope that the old States will stand up for their interest in these lands. Whilst we take a pride in the progress of improvement in that glorious part of our country—the Great West, we must not forget that the old States are borne down to the earth with taxes for improvements that were made to fill up that great West. I hope we will show that we are not derelict to our duty, but that while we are anxious to do everything calculated to benefit the West, we are also willing to protect the interests of the old States, whose sons have peopled the Western States. I hope the day has arrived when we, as members representing the people of this country, will legislate for the whole country. My colleague, I am sure, made the remark more in playfulness than in earnest, that we had no interest in the public lands, and that we were to give them away to those to whom they belonged. Why, if that was true—if my colleague was right, I would say, as he has said, that I would vote to give away the public lands to every man who has not a farm, and who does not enjoy a homestead, rather than that they should be given away to make improvements in those States that have already so largely benefited by improvements.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I have no desire to prolong this debate. I am opposed to this amendment, and ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. HENN moved that the committee rise.

Mr. STUART demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CLARK and HUNTER appointed.

And the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 86, noes 28.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order of the House, being Senate bill 146, entitled "An act to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," and that it had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion by Mr. AVERETT, the House then adjourned.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a motion made by Mr. FELCH, on the 5th instant, to print an additional number of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office accompanying the annual message of the President of the United States, reported thereon; and, in concurrence therewith, it was Ordered, That one thousand copies of the said report be printed, in addition to the usual number, for the use of the General Land Office.

Ordered, That three thousand copies of the said report be printed, one thousand copies of which to be for the use of the Light-House Board.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of resolutions passed by the Legislature of Michigan, presented the 15th January; and from the further consideration of a resolution of the Senate of the 15th January, instructing the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment to the Ottawa and Chippewa nations of Indians of the everplus money which shall be found due, in pursuance of a treaty concluded at Washington the 28th of March, 1836.

EXPLOSION OF STEAM BOILERS.

Mr. BORLAND. I am authorized by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the memorial of Alfred Guthrie, a practical engineer, submitting the results of his experiments in relation to the cause of the explosion of steam boilers, to report in favor of printing the document, and five thousand five hundred additional copies—five hundred of which shall be for the use of Mr. Guthrie. I will remind the Senate of the remarks made yesterday by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] upon introducing these papers and documents. I suppose it will not be necessary to add anything to what he said.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say a word, and I wish to call to the mind of the Senate, if they can remember it, the speeches made by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. ATCHISON,] and the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] and another Senator, upon printing extra copies of such documents. I listened to those suggestions of economy and prudence, at the time; and I submitted, as I had to do, with a good grace. But it seems that those admonitions have all been forgotten, and here we are to print five thousand extra copies, and five hundred more for the author of some essay, not by an officer of the Government—not of anything connected with our legislation, but an essay upon explosions. That is what I understand it to be.

Mr. BADGER. That will be very useful to the Senate; for explosions happen here very often.

Mr. HALE. I object to this; and call upon Senators who so prudently and wisely interfered and refused to print a public document of immense interest, and of great consequence, relating to a practical matter before the Senate, to apply the same rule to this enormous proposition to print five thousand five hundred extra copies of the essay of this gentleman upon explosions. Sir, we have explosions enough, without disseminating essays upon them; and I do hope the Senate will interpose and not sanction this expenditure. But I suppose it is too late. The fashion is set. We printed, I do not know how many numbers of Professor Espy's speculations on storms; and this, I suppose, is something similar to it in regard to thunder. As it appears to be the fashion of the Senate to print extra copies of these documents, I have no hope of arresting this proposition. I shall simply record my vote against it.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator from New Hampshire is, I think, altogether mistaken about the character of this work. He speaks of our printing documents about storms and thunder. This is nothing of the sort. It is, essentially and eminently, a practical work, by a practical man—a man of whom it is said expressly, that he has devoted a lifetime of intelligent and well-directed labor to one of the most important subjects that can be brought before the people of this country—especially important to all those connected with, or in any way dependent for safety or for convenience upon, the navigation of our rivers and lakes by steam. It embodies the most valuable information on this subject—information which has been submitted to the most experienced and scientific men of the country, and who have pronounced it extremely valuable. I am confident of this. I have examined these papers, and the documents that have been presented, and I am of opinion that it is a very valuable treatise upon a very important subject, and that no opposition ought to be made to the printing of it.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

WORKMEN ON THE CAPITOL.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Public Buildings, to which was referred the memorial of the workmen employed on the extension of the Capitol, reported a joint resolution to authorize the continuance of the work on the two wings of the Capitol; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have it read a second time now, and considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. BORLAND. I regret to make any opposition to this—

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish to state the reason why I object. I stated yesterday, when this matter was brought before the Senate, that the subject involved was undergoing an investigation by a committee of the House of Representatives. I was under the impression that a special committee had been appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the correctness of the report, that the foundations laid were not secure. It was supposed by some that these investigations had been abandoned, and that the gentleman moving for the committee had become satisfied, and had withdrawn his proposition. I learn, however, that such is not the fact, and that he is still of opinion that the foundations of the wings are insecure and unsafe; and he is now pressing the other House for permission to send for persons and papers in order to inquire into the matter. For that reason I would be unwilling to see any measure adopted to provide for the continuance of the work, until that investigation should be made.

Mr. HUNTER. I would state to my friend from Arkansas that I have examined into this matter, as I am a member of the Joint Committee on Public Buildings; and even if the suspicion which his friend entertains in relation to the foundations of the wings were true, the passage of this resolution would not affect it much. I have seen the Architect this morning, and he does not expect to carry up the walls until after the first of March, and then only in fine weather. I apprehend, however, that there cannot be much doubt as to the security of the foundations. This resolution, however, limits the work to be done by the appropriation which it makes. The resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] left it indefinite. I think that the object of the Senator will not be delayed by the passage of this resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. Under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Virginia, I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior may continue in employment, for the construction of the wings of the Capitol, as many of the mechanics and laborers as can be properly engaged on the work; and that the sum of $10,000 be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for that purpose: Provided, however, That the walls of the building shall not be carried up in weather which is unsuitable for the work.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

COMPENSATION OF CENSUS MARSHALS.

Mr. BADGER. I am rather late, but I beg the indulgence of the Senate to allow me the opportunity now to present some applications from a few more victims of the "square root" of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] I have certain petitions, which I wish to present, of assistant marshals of North Carolina, praying for assistance and relief from the injurious consequences of the "square root."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have heard of census-takers being victims of this system until I am tired of it; and I wish to make a very brief statement to the Senate in regard to the matter. Of the various memorials which have been presented here from these marshals and assistant marshals, none of them pretend to state the size of their own counties; the number of miles they were required to travel; nor the number of families they had to visit; but, in general terms, without specifying particulars, they ask for more pay. All I have to say on the subject is, that the compensation allowed by the last Congress was three dollars for every thirty miles they traveled. If three dollars is not enough for thirty miles traveling, the compensation ought to be increased; but if it is enough, they have no right to grumble. Besides, they were allowed more per head for counting the population than was ever allowed under any previous census bill. The only difficulty growing out of the subject is in relation to the mileage which they claim; and it can be demonstrated by this "square root," that, when they give the number of families in their territories, their mileage cannot exceed a certain amount. These gentlemen, in their petitions, withhold the statement of the amount of travel they have had to perform, and merely claim, in general terms, more compensation. This is the truth of the case.

Mr. BADGER. I beg to say that I did not intend any real reflection upon the "square root" of the Senator from Kentucky. It is a very good root. I have not the least objection to it in the world. All the objection the marshals in my State have to it is, that it does not give them a reasonable and decent compensation for their services. Some like squares, and some like cubes. It is a matter of taste altogether. I move to refer the memorials to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest that the Senate have not got to the real difficulty. I apprehend that the truth is, that the marshals have not been to school long enough to know how to extract the square root; and hence they do not know exactly what their compensation is. But, if you put it down in figures, they will be satisfied. The explanation of the Senator from Kentucky convinces me of that.

The memorials were referred to the Committee of Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, private bills come up in their order.

Mr. GWIN. I move to dispense with the order requiring private business to be taken up to-day, that we may take up the resolution providing for the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census. We have made great progress in the private business before the Senate. I suppose we have passed fifty private bills, and have scarcely touched the general Calendar. This resolution, to which I have referred, ought to be acted upon. We have to provide for the printing of the census; and I hope we will take up the resolution this morning and dispose of it.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the motion of the Senator from California will not be agreed to. This day has been set apart by the order of the Senate for the consideration of private bills, and I hope the order will be adhered to. The Senator from California will recollect that we are certain to pass public bills. There is no doubt about them. But if we allow private bills to be thrown aside, week after week, Congress will adjourn without disposing of the applications of private citizens for justice from the Government. I hope we will adhere to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GWIN. I have but a single remark to make in reply to the Senator from North Carolina. Never, in the history of the Government, have so many private bills been passed at such an early period of the session. We have not passed half a dozen public bills, while we have passed at least fifty private bills. Our Calendar of private bills is nearly clear, and we have passed more private bills this year than ever before have got back from the House of Representatives. I am as much in favor of acting on all these private bills as the Senator from North Carolina, but I wish also to attend to the public business. I would call the attention of the Senate to one fact: Three or four Senators have the floor with unfinished speeches on various questions, which will occupy the whole of next week.

Mr. BADGER. I am one of those who have unfinished speeches, but I am willing to give up my time to private business.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has the floor upon an important question. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CLARKE] has the floor on his resolutions in regard to the foreign policy of the Government. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] has the floor on the same subject. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] has the floor on the resolution in regard to the Irish exiles. All of these are important questions, and will occupy the whole of next week. And, as we are far in advance of the House in the Private Calendar, I appeal to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, and to other members, to take up this resolution and dispose of it to-day, for we shall not be able to do so next week.

Mr. HALE. I would make a suggestion which, I think, (if the Senator from California will give me his attention,) will obviate all difficulties. It strikes me that this resolution, although it purports to be a public matter, is nothing more than a private bill for the relief of Donelson & Armstrong, and should be put upon the Private Calendar as such.

Mr. GWIN. I do not care how the object is accomplished.

The PRESIDENT. The suggestion cannot be carried out.

Mr. PEARCE. There is evidently no necessity for pressing the consideration of this resolution to-day. If it could be passed through both Houses to-day, there might be some reason in this. But we all know that these returns will not be ready for the printers for a long time to come.

Mr. DOWNS. The Senate well know that I am very apt to urge the taking up of these private bills; but I do not like to kill a good thing by having too much of it. We have certainly passed a great many private bills this session; and now, since we have so many special orders on hand; since we have so many debates to come up, one after another, I think we can, without doing injustice to private claimants, devote this day to the consideration of the subject mentioned by the Senator from California, and get clear of it. We have some half dozen subjects coming up, one after another. One is debated, and then it goes over, till we forget all that has been said on it; and when it is called up again, all that has been said must be gone over again. We have gone pretty deep into this printing matter. We went into the merits of the subject yesterday. But if it is postponed, and not acted on to-day, everything that was said yesterday must be gone over again. I therefore hope that the motion of the Senator from California will be agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. If we have rules, I hope we will observe them. I came here to-day for the purpose of attending to some private claims. I have none for my own State, but there are private claims, which appeal to the justice and liberality of the Senate, and which ought to be attended to—claims that are founded far more in justice, than the one now urged upon the pretext of being a public measure, when in fact it is a private bill. I do not intend, by my vote, to give a preference to this resolution to appropriate money to these gentlemen, before applicants, who are standing at the door there, and whom I have just left, appealing to the justice of the Senate. I hope, if we have rules, that we will observe them.

The PRESIDENT. It is not a rule, but merely an order, which requires Friday to be set apart for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I urged upon them some time ago, when a similar proposition was under consideration, that these discussions are the strongest argument we can have for observing the order of business upon the Calendar. I believe it was the general understanding that we should pursue the order of business upon the Calendar, and take up subjects as they are in their order. I would remind Senators now, as I did on a former occasion, that it has almost uniformly been the case, when propositions of this sort are moved, that more time is consumed in discussing the question, whether we will disregard the rules, and take up business out of order, or follow the Calendar, than would be consumed in passing the measures themselves. I do hope that we will follow the rule that has been adopted, and take up business upon the Calendar in regular order. We shall then do justice to all parties, and advance more rapidly the public business, than by this irregular mode of proceeding.

Mr. ATCHISON. I trust the order of the Senate will be adhered to. The Senator from Louisiana is not so unsophisticated in this business as he has been charged to be. I think that that Senator was not present on the last private bill day; and we had previously, I believe, disposed of most of the private bills in which he was interested. I believe we had disposed of all the private bills in which he felt an interest, except one, and I am told that that looks very squally, and that it is doubtful whether or not it will pass. I do not make any charge against the Senator from Louisiana. I know that he is generous. I know that he, of all men, is least implored by supplicants; but still, without knowing it, these things do operate, even upon the oldest, the most grave and the most honest Senators. I have felt these little anxieties myself, about having private or public bills, in which I have felt an interest, taken up and disposed of, without paying regard to the convenience or the wishes of my fellow members of the Senate. I am willing to make all my own business special orders, and give them precedence over all other bills; and when the business which I have specially under my care is disposed of, I feel the utmost indifference as to what shall be done in regard to other bills.

Now, we made an order at the commencement of this session, at the instance of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] and my friend from Louisiana, setting apart this day for the consideration of private claims. They were the principal advocates of that order. And now, the Senator from Louisiana is the first man who is willing to dispense with it, for the purpose, as was well remarked by the Senator from South Carolina, of taking up a mixed matter, that is partly private and partly public. The printing of the census returns is a public consideration; but who shall do it—the gentlemen named in the resolution, or others—is certainly a private matter to them. I think it has been demonstrated that there is no necessity of hurry in regard to that resolution. The printing of the census returns may as well be ordered next week, or six weeks from this time, as now.

Mr. DOWNS. The Senate may rest assured that I could not have been actuated by the motives which the Senator seems to suppose; because it happens that on last Friday I was absent, when I ought to have been here; and on that day the only bill in which I felt any particular interest was postponed on account of my absence. So that if I had any interested feeling about this matter, it would lead me to favor the taking up of private bills to-day, in order to remedy my negligence on last Friday. I think the inducement which I stated at first was sufficient. I think we ought to take up this measure and dispose of it. There is no urgency in regard to these private bills. No gentleman has named any particular bill which requires action at this moment. We have already passed as many private bills as will occupy the House of Representatives for some months to come. I want this resolution to be disposed of. Let us vote on it at once. Let us not be fighting it off in this way. We have had talking enough about it; and I want gentlemen to come up to the mark and vote on it, and tell us what they are going to do in relation to it. If they intend to vote against it, let them do so. They have a perfect right to do so. But let the resolution be disposed of at once; and then let us go on with other business. Every one understands the resolution. Every one knows what it is. It has been discussed sufficiently. Let us dispose of it at once and go on with other business. I hope that it will be taken up and acted upon to-day.

Mr. SOULE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradbury, Brodhead, Clemens, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Gwin, Houston, Jones of Iowa, King, Mallory, Rusk, Sebastian, and Shields—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Seward, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—28.

IRA DAY.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont. This bill was under consideration by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole on Friday last when the Senate adjourned, after agreeing to a motion to strike out the words "together with the interest thereon."

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Delaware takes considerable interest in this bill, and I should like to observe that he is obtaining some information in relation to it. I therefore desire, as that Senator is not in his seat, that the bill may be passed over for the present. I have been told that he had ascertained that there was an adverse opinion of the Attorney General in a case precisely similar, and that there have been two adverse reports in this very case. I do not know that this is so. I have been told so; and if that is so, I think we ought to pass the bill over until the Senator from Delaware may be in his place.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that when a motion is made to take from the files of the Senate any memorials or papers, an adverse report having been made, the Chair puts the question; and according to a rule of proceeding here, these papers cannot be again presented unless they are accompanied by new matter, and some cause be shown by the party presenting them why they should not have been so reported upon.

A SENATOR. There has been no adverse report in this case.

Mr. HUNTER. I know nothing about the matter personally. All I know is what I have learned from the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. UPHAM. There has never been any adverse report in this case.

Mr. RUSK. I do not know of any adverse report. There have been, if I recollect aright, two or three favorable reports in this case.

Mr. UPHAM. There was one occasion on which the committee were discharged from the further consideration of this matter; but there never was an adverse report.

The consideration of the bill was passed over informally.

DAVID C. CASH AND GILES U. ELLIS.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of a bill for the relief of David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis. This was a bill from the House of Representatives, with an accompanying report, synopses of which have already appeared in the Globe. It was adversely reported upon by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the report?

Mr. BADGER. The question, I suppose, does not come up upon the report, because the bill is before us.

The PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose the Senate will signify their concurrence in the report by rejecting the bill.

The PRESIDENT. That is precisely the question. If they reject the bill they will concur in the report.

Mr. BADGER. I would like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT. There is no written report from the Senate committee. There is a report from the House committee. The Senate committee have merely reported by an indorsement upon the bill. Let the bill be read.

The bill was accordingly read.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already stated that there is a report made by the House Committee on Military Affairs, and it will be read if any Senator desires it.

Mr. RUSK. Let the report be read.

The report was read accordingly.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Committee on Military Affairs reported adversely on this case, but have made no written report. One reason for not presenting a written report was, that in a case of this kind, it is almost impossible to do so; and another reason was, that the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, which has just been read, is of such a character, that had we made a written report, we must have contradicted that report.

This is an old case, which has been before the Senate often. Cash acted as a deputy quartermaster, and Ellis as a deputy commissary. They obtained supplies and material from the Government to a very large amount, and they signed themselves in this capacity, one as deputy quartermaster, and the other as deputy commissary, and they distributed, God knows how much, for they do not pretend to tell. When they came to settle their accounts with the Department, the Department asked them for some vouchers for the application of the supplies they had received; but it seems they were unable to furnish any such vouchers. The Department, therefore, instituted a suit against them, and then they come and make affidavit that they were not acting really in that capacity, officially, but were acting in their individual capacity, and were not, therefore, responsible as officers of the Government, but only to the officer whose agents they were, and whose name is mentioned in the report of the House of Representatives. They claim that they accounted with him, and left him to account with the Department.

Now, the papers on file show that their receipts were given to the Department, as quartermaster and commissary. They received the property of the Government in that capacity, and could not have received it in any other. They took that property, and distributed it in that capacity; and they turn round afterwards, when called upon to account to the Government, and deny the official character which they had assumed to obtain the property, and make affidavit, that while they stated that to the Government, they were merely acting as agents of some other man. How this bill passed the other House, I cannot tell. Now, there are two views which present themselves. In the first place, there is a suit in course of prosecution against them. Let them show, when they defend that suit, that they were really acting in the capacity in which they pretend they were acting here. I have consulted the Department, and I am informed that the Department will go on to prosecute the suit. If the statements they make are true, they can exonerate themselves; and if the statements are false, of course they will be held responsible to the Government for the amount of money out of which they actually cheated it. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to reject the bill.

Mr. PRESIDENT. The question must be on concurring in the report.

Mr. SHIELDS. A motion to postpone indefinitely will answer the same purpose.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. RUSK. I think the Senator is laboring under a mistake, as I understood the subject from hearing the report read. Judging from the report, this seems a very clear case of merit. As I understand, this man Crum was acting as quartermaster and commissary. The applicants here were, the one as lieutenant, and the other a private soldier, and both employed to act as the deputies of Crum, the one as quartermaster and the other as commissary. This frequently occurs, and it seems the House of Representatives are sustained in this matter by the affidavit of Crum himself, that he employed these men to act as deputies, and required them to report all their proceedings to him, as the responsible officer of the Government. That is what I understand from the report; and it seems that when these individuals applied to be paid for their services, not as quartermasters or deputies, but as soldiers, the Government refused to pay, because this was an unsettled account. The Committee on Military Affairs seems to think that, because they signed themselves deputy quartermasters, it is conclusive evidence against them.

Mr. SHIELDS. These two men were at different posts, acting in the capacity which I have stated. They drew from Colonel Hunt all these supplies. The man whom they now pretend they acted for, whose name is Crum, became a defaulter, has never accounted to the Government, and never can. After he became a defaulter, and they were called upon to account to the Government, they turn round and insist that they acted as the agents of Crum; and he himself admits it, because he is a defaulter and owes so much that he can never pay the Government. I will ask honorable Senators to look at the papers and at their own receipts as reported from the Department. If the statements they make be true, they have a good legal defence. I will ask any of my honorable legal friends here if the facts reported are not a good legal defence in any court in the United States?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly they are.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then if they can maintain that defence, why should they come here, in anticipation of the decision, for relief? I look upon that single point alone as being enough to condemn their claim.

Mr. BADGER. That is the point in the case,

Mr. RUSK. I was engaged a moment ago when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] was making his statement, and did not hear what the point was.

Mr. BADGER. With the consent of the Senator from Illinois, and if the Senator from Texas will allow me, I will explain that point to him. There is an action at law, brought by the Government of the United States, now pending against these men. The matters which they set up in their petition, as reported by the House committee, furnish, if true, a complete legal defence—not merely an equitable defence, but a complete legal defence to the action. Then, the inquiry is, why should we relieve them upon an ex parte examination, when the question is now pending between them and the Government before a legal forum, where these questions can be better heard and more fully and satisfactorily decided than they can be here? If the facts, as they represent them, are true, they will obtain a verdict; and if they are not true, or not established, of course the verdict will be against them.

Mr. RUSK. The honorable Senator from North Carolina appears entirely to misunderstand the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Let the question be tried upon the pending action; and it will then be quite time to give them relief when a verdict has been rendered against them.

Mr. RUSK. I must repeat, that Senators appear entirely to misunderstand the object of this bill. The bill is not designed to relieve these men from any responsibility which they may have incurred to the Government of the United States by a misappropriation of this property—not by any means. It is only to pay them what appears to be due to them, as shown by the books of the Department, for their services, the one as a lieutenant and the other as a private soldier.

Mr. BADGER. But if these men already owe the Government anything, they ought not to be paid the money which this bill proposes to pay them. That question is now pending, and it would only be proper to let this bill lie over until that question is decided.

Mr. RUSK. And if the Government should not obtain a verdict against them, how are they to succeed in obtaining their pay?

Mr. BADGER. By bringing in their claim.

Mr. RUSK. How can that be done after the Senate have rejected the bill? I have not seen this report, but, from the reading of it, it strikes me as being a clear case of merit, in which these men simply ask payment for services rendered. If you reject the bill, you must disbelieve the affidavits of these three men—Crum, Cash, and Ellis. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow, in order that we may have an opportunity of giving it a fuller examination. It is but a small matter. The amount involved is not considerable, and is hardly worth the trouble which must be undertaken by these men to obtain it; but I would not like to do what appears to be injustice even in a small matter.

Mr. BADGER. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, I will add one word in further explanation. The officers of the Government have very properly refused to pay the amount of money which might otherwise be due to these persons, on the ground that they are debtors to the Government to a large amount. They say that they are not debtors; and if their statement is true, they can defend themselves in an action at law against the Government. If their statement is false, they are not entitled to any relief; and if it be true, they will undoubtedly obtain it. If it is found by the decision in the action, to which reference has been made, that they do not owe the Government, then their pay will be given to them at once, and we will have no difficulty in passing a bill for their relief.

Mr. RUSK. Well, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow. The amount is so small that it is scarcely worth the trouble of these men to come here to get it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say a single word to my friend from Texas. I would be as unwilling to be unjust to any poor soldier as the honorable Senator himself. But we examined this matter very candidly in the committee, and it was unanimously agreed to report as we did. I regret that we felt compelled to do it. We did it from a sense of justice to these men, in view of the facts presented to us.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves to postpone the further consideration of the question till to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER. Which question has priority?

The PRESIDENT. The question on the motion to postpone till to-morrow.

The question was then taken, and it was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition now is to postpone the consideration of the bill indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS H. LEGGETT.

Mr. SEWARD. During my absence a bill for the relief of Thomas H. Leggett, as I am informed, was arrived at on the Private Calendar, and was laid on the table. I now call it up in order that it may take its place.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think, in justice to the Senator from New York, this bill should be considered now. It was arrived at in its order, and in consequence of the absence of the Senator it was laid upon the table.

The question was taken on the motion to take up the bill, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a bill for refunding duties, as I understand it, and I should like it to lie over for the present.

Mr. SEWARD. It is not taken up with a view to action, but simply that it may take its place on the Calendar.

MRS. E. A. McNEIL.

The Senate next proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Mrs. E. A. McNeil, widow of the late General John McNeil, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FELCH. The Senator from New Hampshire, who takes an interest in that bill, is sick and not able to be present. I therefore move that the bill be passed over informally.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN ERVIN.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of a bill to confirm the claim of John Ervin to a certain tract of land in the Bastrop Claim.

Mr. DOWNS. I will state, Mr. President, that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] desires to go into an investigation of this question. He is not now in his seat. On his proposition the bill was laid over last Friday; and, as he is not here now, perhaps it would be as well to pass the bill over.

Mr. BADGER. I hope we shall not lay this bill over any more.

Mr. DOWNS. I dislike to take up the bill in the absence of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. I have the impression that many bills of this description have been passed. Is not that so, sir?

Mr. DOWNS. Many bills very much like it have been passed.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not aware that this is different from other cases. If so, I wish the Senator from Louisiana would state the fact.

Mr. DOWNS. It is analogous to many bills which passed at the last session. Some few were excluded by the rules which were adopted at the last session. It is in the same spirit as those that have been passed, though not strictly and technically within the rule. The reading of the report, which is very brief, will show what it is.

Mr. DAWSON. Read the report.

Mr. FELCH. I think it will be better to let the bill lie over for the present, till the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is in his seat, as he has intimated that he wishes to express his views upon it. My impression is, that the bill gives a preëmption right to a small portion of land. But I have not examined the question, on account of the fact that the honorable Senator from Kentucky had taken it in charge; and I think it will be better to let it lie over till he is present to attend to it. I make that motion that it be passed over informally.

Mr. BADGER. I hope not. I wish to say to the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] that if he chooses to have it lie over, I have nothing to say. But if it does not pass in consequence of lying over, he will know at whose door the blame will rest.

Mr. DOWNS. Then I will not consent to let it lie over.

Mr. FELCH. The law which is referred to in that bill specifies two classes of cases to which relief may be granted. The one, those who claim under Bastrop, holding under a Spanish grant, and his assignees; and to that class of persons there is given six hundred and forty acres of land without any compensation to the United States for it. It was intended to relieve a class of persons who purchased under an old Spanish grant, declared to be now invalid.

The second class of cases embraces those persons who, without having any claim by way of a title from Bastrop, are entitled by virtue of possession to a preemption right to one hundred and sixty acres, including their improvements. If I understand this matter correctly from hearing the report read, this Ervin does not trace back his title from Bastrop; he has merely occupancy as the foundation of his claim, and his case, therefore, comes within the category mentioned in one of the last sections of the act, giving relief to those who have occupied lands for a certain number of years. If no legislation is had, he will be entitled to a preemption right to one hundred and sixty acres including his improvements. If this bill passes, it will put him on the same footing exactly as those who received a title from Bastrop. As I stated before, my impression is, that it is a case in which the preemption right ought to be granted. He will then receive one hundred and sixty acres of land under the preemption, and no more. This bill proposes to give him six hundred and forty acres, and also to relieve him from paying any compensation to the Government for it. It seems to me he should be allowed to remain under the rights which he now has; or, if it be desirable, let him have a preemption right. But I see the Senator from Kentucky is now in his place, and I yield the floor to him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe the honorable Senator from Michigan has stated everything that I have to state upon the subject. From the examination which I have made, this gentleman, if this bill passes, will get lands for nothing to the amount of six hundred and forty acres, when, according to legislation, he would be entitled to a preemptive right of one hundred and sixty acres. I see no reason why we should enlarge the amount and give him that difference. The grounds on which this claim was placed, the other day, was this: A man by the name of Ballinger lived upon the land that this memorialist has occupied. Ballinger, according to the statement of the memorialist, purchased the land of Bastrop, and paid him for it. The memorialist says he intended to purchase it from Ballinger, but he has never paid him a cent. He says Ballinger abandoned the land, and has absented himself for a long time, and has never received anything. Now, what condition shall we be placed in if Ballinger should hereafter come forward and say, "I want Congress to compensate me for this land, which I purchased of Bastrop;" and suppose he says, "You have compensated everybody else, and allowed them a tract of land, why not pay me? Will you take advantage of my absence after I paid Bastrop, and plead the statute of limitations upon me?" Government has never done that. Now, if Ballinger comes forward and says, "You agreed by your legislation that all those who purchased from Bastrop and paid him for that land should hold it"—what answer will you give him? You must say to him, "You are to be put upon the same footing as other individuals." Now, this individual simply asks Government to do for him what Government would do for Ballinger, if he were here. I do not see any obligation for such a course except upon the ground which is contended for, that he has occupied the land till, by the laws of Louisiana, he could set up a title by prescription against Ballinger. And as he can prescribe against Ballinger, he wants you to cut off Ballinger, and let him be placed with reference to Bastrop as Ballinger and yourselves would be placed. It seems to me not just to let a man come in and make out a title, when he says he has not paid a cent, but merely intended to do it, and then set up a title by prescription against a man from whom he intended to buy the land. In this view of the case I am willing to say to this gentleman, "Take your head right, as we call it in Kentucky, or, as it is called here, your preemption—take your one hundred and sixty acres of land by preemption, pay for it as your neighbors have done, and with regard to the excess, you have no right to it at all." I think we should reject this bill, and let the law take its course.

Mr. HALE. As I was one of the committee who reported this bill, I think I can answer the objection of the Senator from Kentucky. The case is an exceedingly simple one. Settlers located themselves upon this land, and among the rest was this man Ballinger; and subsequently this petitioner, who went under Ballinger, intending to purchase his title. He has been there for more than twenty-three years, and Ballinger went off and never made his appearance again. By the bill which you passed last session, if Ballinger were here, he would be entitled to this land; but he is not here. Now, the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, does not arise here at all. We do not in any way interfere with Ballinger's title. That title will stand just as good when this bill is passed as it does now. All that we do, is to say that the United States shall not come in as a third party between Ballinger and this man Ervin. Ballinger has a good title, if we do not disturb him; and all that we do in this bill, is to say to this poor old man, that we will keep "hands off," as between him and Ballinger. We say to him, "If you have a good title, keep it, and we will give you ours; or, rather, we will not interfere." It seems to me in that view of the case this bill ought to pass.

Mr. DAWSON. I will merely ask the Senator from Louisiana one question. Did Ballinger ever purchase six hundred and forty acres from Bastrop?

Mr. DOWNS. It is so stated in the papers.

Mr. HALE. I believe he purchased a larger quantity than that.

The bill was then reported without amendment, and, on a division, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JANE IRWIN.

Mr. JAMES. I throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate, and ask its unanimous consent to take up a bill for the relief of Jane Irwin.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone the prior orders and take up this bill, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The bill was read a second time. It proposes to pay Jane Irwin, the only child of Colonel Jared Irwin, who served in the Georgia State troops from the beginning to the close of the revolutionary war, as an equivalent for services rendered and losses sustained by him, the half-pay of a captain for the period of thirty-five years.

There being no proposition to amend, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. PEARCE. I should like to have some explanation of that bill.

Mr. HALE. Let the report be read: It will explain everything.

Mr. COOPER. I will state what the substance of the report is.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to ask if the committee were unanimous in their report?

Mr. COOPER. They were last year. The father of Jane Irwin was an officer in the Georgia line of the Army, and performed most meritorious service during the whole of the revolutionary war. He was in many engagements both in Georgia and the Carolinas. After the close of the war, he removed to the frontiers and was often engaged there in the Indian wars, and performed service not only as a soldier, but was eminently useful in subsisting troops in that out-of-the-way country. He lost a very large amount of property, and never received from the United States a cent by way of compensation for his services or the losses he sustained.

The present applicant is the only surviving child of General Irwin; who was afterwards, for several successive terms, Governor of the State of Georgia. If ever a meritorious claim came before the Senate, that does not fall within the ordinary rule, this is one.

The report was then read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

COMMODORE WARRINGTON.

The Senate next proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill for the relief of M. K. Warrington and C. St. J. Chubb, executors of Captain Lewis Warrington; which was read.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to open an account with M. K. Warrington and C. St. J. Chubb, executors of the late Captain Lewis Warrington, and the officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Peacock, their legal representatives and assigns, on account of one moiety of the sloop Epervier, her tackle, implements of war, and specie on board at the time of her capture in 1814, which moiety was, by mistake, paid into the Treasury of the United States; and to settle their respective rights therein, according to the act of April 23, 1800, for the better government of the Navy of the United States; and that the sum, when so settled, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BRADBURY called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs; from which it appears, that the same subject was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs at the first session of the last Congress, when a report was made, briefly setting forth the facts out of which the claim originated, which the committee adopt as a part of their present report, and recommend the passage of the bill without amendment. The committee reported—on the memorial of Lewis Warrington, for himself, officers, and crew of the sloop-of-war Peacock, and praying the balance of prize money due them for the capture of the British ship Epervier—that in the month of April, 1814, the British ship Epervier was captured by the Peacock, under the command of the memorialist, and was afterwards, in the district court of Georgia, condemned, with its tackle, ammunition, &c., as a prize of war to the captors, and a sale by the marshal was ordered to be made; that there was on board the Epervier a large amount of specie, which was condemned as prize money. The Epervier was a vessel of equal force with the Peacock, as appears by the report of Captain Warrington, by the report of the arrival of the prize at Savannah, by the report of the officer in charge of it, by negotiations between the Department and Captain Warrington for the purchase of the prize, and finally by the decree of condemnation to the captors only.

By the fifth section of the act of Congress of April, 1800, for the better government of the Navy of the United States, it was enacted that all the proceeds of captured vessels which shall be adjudged good prizes, when of equal or superior force to the vessel or vessels capturing them, shall be the sole property of the captors; but when of inferior force, they shall be divided equally between the Government and the captors. It is, therefore, certain, in the opinion of the committee, as well from the true facts of the case as from the decree of condemnation, that the officers and men of the Peacock were entitled to the whole of the proceeds, and the same should have been paid over to them by the marshal. But this was not done. On the contrary, the marshal, from some mistake or misapprehension, treated it as a case for a division between the United States and the captors, and therefore paid one moiety to each. The committee were therefore of the opinion that the moiety received by the United States, being undoubtedly the property of the captors, ought in justice to be accounted for to the true owners. The lapse of time since the erroneous payment was made might afford some objection to the relief if the ground of the claim was uncertain or not proved; but all the facts and the ground of the claim stand proved by official papers which cannot be mistaken. They can be ascertained now with the same unerring certainty as at the time of the transaction. These proofs accompany the memorial submitted with the report. The memorialist asked only the principal of the sum; and the right being clear, the justice of the demand, instead of being weakened, is strengthened by the great length of time the United States have had what originally belonged to the captors. The claim grew out of one of a series of victories upon the ocean and lakes, which shed such glory upon our country, and must ever be remembered with patriotic pride by every one bearing the name of an American. The committee, in view of the considerations named in the report, accompanied it by a bill.

Mr. BRADBURY. I believe a very considerable amount is involved in this bill. I recollect having examined the question when it was before the Senate some three years ago. The facts are not very fresh in my recollection at this time; but I think that the application for relief on the part of Commodore Warrington and his associates is of a somewhat recent date.

Mr. BADGER. It is.

Mr. BRADBURY. I think it is a little remarkable that the captors of a vessel, which had on board a valuable cargo of specie, should have so long delayed their application.

Mr. BADGER. If the Senator will allow me, I will make a statement, which will cause the remarkableness to disappear. The case is simply this: In April, 1814, Commodore Warrington, then in command of the American ship Peacock, a sloop-of-war of eighteen guns, attacked and captured the sloop of war Epervier, also of eighteen guns. The Epervier was sent into the port of Savannah, in charge of a prize-master, for condemnation. She was condemned in that port, and a decree of the court directed the whole amount of the capture to be paid to the captors. The honorable Senator [Mr. BRADBURY] shakes his head. It is very easy to do that; but if he will read the papers he will find that it is so. The decree of the court directed the whole of the money to be paid to the captors, and not one cent to the United States. Commodore Warrington did not quit his cruise, and come home to attend to his pecuniary interest, but continued to prosecute his cruise against the enemies of his country. Consequently he was not here at the time the decree was made and the payment made under the decree. The marshal of the district of Georgia, whose duty it was to pay the money to those to whom it was awarded by the court, to wit: the captors, instead of doing that, paid one half the money to the prize agent, and the other half into the Treasury of the United States. The ships were of equal force. That is proved, in the first place, by the decree directing the money to be paid to the captors; because if the captured vessel had been of inferior force, it was the duty of the court to have decreed one moiety to the United States. It is proved, next, by the fact that the vessels were reported by the captors to be of equal force; by the fact that the Secretary of the Navy at the time negotiated with Commodore Warrington for the purchase of the captured sloop, for the Navy of the United States, as being the property of the captors; and by the fact that in the Navy Register, after that ship became ours by capture, she is rated as a sloop of war of eighteen guns, as was the Peacock. These are the facts. Under the law, it is perfectly clear, that that being the state of the case, the captors were entitled to all the money.

But I said that I would give the Senator from Maine an explanation of how it happened that this claim was not preferred for many years. I take pleasure in doing so; because the gallant officer and most excellent gentleman in whose name this application was made at the last Congress, and who is now no more, exhibited in relation to the whole transaction an honorable delicacy and propriety of deportment that add additional value to the character he earned by his integrity and gallant service in the cause of his country. The same question was asked when this bill was before the Senate at the first session of the last Congress, and I was unable to answer why the application had been deferred. I was unable to answer, because that gentleman, during the whole time this bill was in progress in the Senate, though he knew I had taken charge of it, and reported it from the committee, and that upon some objections taken to it on its first coming up, it had been postponed, and that I had waited three months before I called it up for action, never came near me, never opened his mouth to me upon the subject; and he was willing, I believe, to have lost every penny, rather than place himself in the attitude of a man who would descend, by application to a member of a committee, to obtain the successful prosecution of a claim however honorable and just. But after the bill had passed the Senate, and when it was in the House of Representatives, I saw Commodore Warrington here one day, and took occasion to ask him how it happened that the claim had not been presented sooner. He gave me the following statement: "I went in prosecution of the cruise in which I was engaged when "I captured the Epervier, and sent it into port for condemnation. When I returned, I found that but one half the prize money had been paid into the hands of the agent. I knew it was wrong. I applied to a distinguished and honorable gentleman, then a member of Congress from Virginia, and asked him to institute some proceedings for my relief. He said to me, 'it is impossible, Commodore, to go behind the decree.'" He took it for granted, and so did Commodore Warrington, that the marshal had paid the money according to the decree. He had no idea that the marshal, upon a decree in favor of the captors alone, had paid one half the money to the United States, but supposed that it was a mistake of the judge who pronounced condemnation. There the matter rested; and years and years elapsed before it was discovered that the decree was right and the payment wrong.

That, sir, is the explanation which I have to give; and I wish to say, that though the amount is large, there has not been a claim, in my opinion, from the foundation of the Government, whether for a million dollars or for a penny, more justly due to more honorable men who have rendered important service to the country. It has been too long delayed. The Government has had possession and use of the money for forty years. All that is asked is the simple return of the money without interest.

Mr. BRADBURY. I have heard the explanation of the honorable Senator from North Carolina with pleasure. He speaks so well that I always listen to him with a great deal of pleasure. I think, however, that we should examine this subject carefully, and see why it is that the claim was suspended so long without an application for relief. It looks a little singular to me that for some forty years an individual, residing at the capital for a very considerable portion of the time, should not be aware of the fact that the Government was indebted to him and others with whom he was associated, in a large sum of money.

Mr. BADGER. I tried to explain it. I imagine the Senator did not listen to me.

Mr. BRADBURY. If the Senator wishes the floor, I will yield it.

Mr. BADGER. Not at all.

Mr. BRADBURY. I suppose the act which grants to the captors, in cases of the capture of vessels of an equal or superior force, the whole property captured, was intended as an incentive, and to reward those in the Navy for extraordinary exertions. Technically, the contest from which this claim arises, was between vessels of equal size; but by an examination of the facts it will be found that the capture was made without much exercise on the part of our ship, and the captured vessel was, in fact, inferior in size, inferior in men, and inferior in its armament; so that the amount which was received by the captors was the amount to which they were fairly entitled, and was all to which they were entitled. If we, disregarding the technical rules, look to whether the vessels were of equal size, we shall find that the British ship was inferior in metal, throwing, I think, something more than a hundred pounds less on a broadside. It was inferior in men; the American ship containing nearly double the amount of efficient men. The prize was taken so easily that there was hardly a contest. Not an individual was lost in the fight; I believe there were one or two wounded. I apprehend that, at the time, the captors were perfectly satisfied with the decree. I think that, after so long a time, during which this claim has been permitted to slumber, it is at least expedient that the Senate should pause before they pass the bill. If I supposed that the claim had substantial merit, I should certainly concur with the Senator from North Carolina, that lapse of time is not a sufficient bar to it. I submit these remarks, not from a desire of doing injustice to the service of the gallant officer who commanded the American ship at that time, but from a sense of duty.

Mr. BADGER. The honorable Senator from Maine occupies, upon this subject, precisely the position usually taken by British writers, in depreciating the value of the victories gained by our naval force over the British during the war of 1812. How does the Senator undertake to know whether these vessels were of equal force or not? The Secretary of the Navy at that time thought they were of equal force. They were reported to the Department as of equal force. The judge who ordered the condemnation thought they were of equal force. And now, we are told that this victory, which we had heretofore thought reflected some glory upon our arms, was nothing; that there was not a contest; that there was twice the number of men in the American ship that there was in the British; and that the ships were of a different weight of metal. I hope the Senate will not add to the injustice of declining to pay this money, the indignity of such a reproach upon the gallant men concerned in the accomplishment of that deed.

The decree of the court was, that the money should be paid to the captors. Not one word was said about the United States. The marshal, by a mistake, I suppose, instead of paying the whole of the money to the captors, paid half of it to the United States. That is the case. The United States got so much money, by a mistake of the marshal, which belonged, under the decree, to the captors. If it had been the case of an individual, an action could have been brought by the captors, and the money recovered. But the United States cannot be sued. I have stated the reason why the claim has been delayed. Commodore Warrington, knowing the money had been paid in a wrong manner, applied to a gentleman from Virginia, who, presuming the marshal had followed the decree, stated that they could not go behind that decree. But it turns out that the decree was right, and the payment by the marshal wrong.

Mr. BRADBURY. It is a long time since I looked into the papers of the case. I had a different impression in regard to the decree. Probably the Senator is right in his statement. I should like to have it read.

The decree was read, as follows:

The United States vessel of war Peacock vs. $117,903, captured in the Epervier, libeled prize.

The United States vessel of war Peacock, commanded by Lewis Warrington, Esq., in the late capture of his British Majesty's sloop of war Epervier, brought into this port, captured also the sum of $117,903, which has been libeled by the district attorney. The usual motion has been published, and proclamation made; and no claim appearing, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the sum of $117,903 be condemned as a prize of war, to the captors, to be distributed as the law directs, after costs and charges.

W. STEVENS,
District Judge of Georgia.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRANCES P. GARDNER.

The bill for the relief of Frances P. Gardner, reported from the Committee on Pensions, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that the Secretary of the Interior be required to renew the pension heretofore allowed and paid to Frances P. Gardner, the same to continue for five years, commencing January 1, 1850.

The report of the committee was read, from which it appears that the petitioner is the widow of the late Captain George W. Gardner, of the United States Army, who was killed in the massacre of Major Dade's command in Florida. She was left a widow in destitute circumstances, with two young children to support. Her father, Lieutenant Abraham Fowler, and her brother-in-law, both died in their country's service, and her only near relative—a brother—was at the date of the petition on duty in Mexico. Thus situated, she asked for a continuance of a pension which was allowed her under the act of July 4, 1836. On May 20, 1850, a bill for her relief was reported to the Senate; and the committee have thought proper to report a similar bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. SMITH. A bill exactly corresponding with the one now before us passed the Senate at the last Congress. It was sent to the House of Representatives, and was not acted upon, I suppose, for want of time. It is exactly analogous to the case of Mrs. Dade, a bill for whose relief has already passed the Senate at the present session. Captain Gardner, who was a native of this city, fell in what is called "Dade's massacre," in Florida; Major Dade being the commander of the detachment, and Captain Gardner the second in command. The circumstances of that massacre are too well known to the Senate to make it necessary for me to advert to the particulars. Mrs. Gardner is a native of my State. She transmitted her application to me, and I laid it before the Senate. I wish, if necessary, to call the attention of my honorable friend from Florida, who is acquainted with the case of Mrs. Dade, to this.

Mr. BADGER. There is no objection to the bill.

Mr. SMITH. I do not know that there is any objection to it. But my friend from Florida is acquainted with the case, if it is necessary to say anything about it.

Mr. MALLORY. I presume there can be no objection to the bill. It is very similar to the bill passed for the relief of Mrs. Dade. Major Dade fell in the massacre at the beginning of the Florida war. So did Captain Gardner. The case of Mrs. Gardner is eminently entitled to the consideration of the Senate. I can see no reason why a distinction should be raised between the two cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WILLIAM A. RICHMOND.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of William A. Richmond, which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment.

The bill proposes to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of William A. Richmond, late superintendent of Indian affairs at Detroit, Michigan, upon principles of equity and justice, and that whatever sum or sums of money, if any, be found due to him shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment of the committee is to insert at the end of the bill the words:

"Provided, That such sum of money shall not exceed $240."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXTENSION OF PATENTS.

The PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar is a bill to extend two patents of Zebulon Parker.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, the consideration of the bill was postponed until Friday next.

JOHN F. CALLAN.

The bill for the relief of John F. Callan, administrator of Daniel Renner, deceased, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the claim of John F. Callan, administrator of Daniel Renner, deceased, of the firm of Renner & Heath—which claim arises from the alleged burning of a rope-walk and of seine twine therein, in the District of Columbia, by the public enemy, in the month of August, 1814, belonging to said firm—to be audited and settled on principles of equity and justice, looking to the evidence heretofore produced before Congress or the Treasury Department, or hereafter to be taken; provided that the allowance so made shall in no case exceed the sum of $6,744.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to hear it read.

Mr. WADE. As I perceive that the Senator who takes charge of the bill is not in his seat, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator who reported the bill is absent, but he wished me to ask the Senate to consider it to-day.

Mr. WADE. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I beg leave to make a single suggestion in connection with what was said by the honorable Senator from Maryland. The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITCOMB,] who is absent on account of illness, requested that this case should go over in the event of there being a serious opposition to it. If the honorable Senator from Virginia is decidedly of opinion that the bill ought not to be passed, I think it would be better to lay it over. Perhaps he will withdraw his opposition after hearing the report read, which was made by the gentleman from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT. The reading of the report has been called for.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I hope the reading will be proceeded with.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the bill be laid over until Friday next. That case was before the Committee of Claims some time ago, when I was a member of the committee, and I believe an unfavorable report was made. I am not certain about the matter, and I wish the bill laid over, so that I may look into the facts.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I am informed that there is a decided opposition to the bill; it would, therefore, be better to let it go over until the honorable Senator from Indiana, who reported it, is in his place.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My motion is to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next. I want to say now that this claim relates to a matter which has once been paid for. I understand that an allowance has been made, and the claim now is for an additional allowance. I think the claim was reported against some two or three years ago.

Mr. BRODHEAD. That is true.

Mr. BAYARD. That is the fact.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I think the bill ought to be laid over.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator from Kentucky made one observation, which I think demands a reply. He says this claim has been paid. Now, I can inform the honorable Senator that it has not been paid. One of the individual claimants has, I believe, been paid a sum of money, but not for what this bill provides.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that this bill provides for a resettlement of the accounts upon the testimony already filed, and such additional testimony as may be hereafter presented. That opens the whole matter, and embraces a repayment of that which has already been paid for, either in whole or in part.

Mr. BAYARD. The former payment was for personal property which was destroyed in 1814. The bill now reported provides relief for the destruction of the rope-walk and twine of these parties. My own opinions are adverse to this claim; and I shall state my reasons for those opinions whenever the bill comes up. I do not think we ought to pass the bill.

Mr. PRATT. I think we had better decide this bill to-day. The honorable Senator who reported this bill, requested me to take his position in respect to it, and to explain it. I think I understand it sufficiently, and I hope it will be acted upon to-day. If it is right, I hope it will be passed to-day. If it is wrong, I hope the Senate will reject it to-day. We can just as well understand and decide it to-day as we can at any future day. I hope, therefore, that we will act on it to-day, and settle it in some way. If the motion to postpone be rejected, the report can be read, and I can explain the facts of the case, I think, so as to enable the Senate to act understandingly.

The motion to postpone was agreed to, there being, on a division, 19 ayes and 16 noes.

T. H. McMANUS.

The bill to authorize T. H. McManus to enter by preemption certain lands in the Greensburg district, Louisiana, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that T. H. McManus be authorized, under such instructions as may be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to enter by preemption, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, at the land office at Greensburg, Louisiana, such quantity of public lands, not to exceed eight hundred acres, according to legal subdivisions, as may embrace his actual improvements in the parish of East Feliciana, on the waters of the Black Creek, township No. 1, and range No. 3, provided that such entry shall not interfere with the valid rights of others, and shall be made after the return to the aforesaid land office of an approved plat of said township.

Mr. DOWNS. I will state the facts of the case very briefly. Mr. McManus purchased at probate sale, after the death of the parties who had settled on this land, their right of preemption. He bought the rights to two tracts. In addition to that there is a small quantity of vacant land near him which he wishes to enter. Now, on these two purchases, which, perhaps, under the restrictions of the preemption laws, he cannot properly enter as a preemption right, but of which he was a bona fide purchaser at a probate sale, and also a quantity of vacant land adjoining, to which nobody else sets up a claim, he asks, in order to complete his title, that he may be permitted to enter the whole, not exceeding eight hundred acres, by preemption right. There is a statement accompanying the report and petition, made by a number of his neighbors living around him, confirming the facts as he states them in his petition. All he asks is the mere right of preemption.

He purchased these improvements for a valuable consideration, when they were sold at probate sale; and I presume there can be no doubt of his right to enter that much. Whether he shall be allowed to enter, in addition, the small quantity of vacant land adjoining, which nobody claims, is a matter for the Senate to decide. If I recollect rightly, this bill passed the Senate at the last session. At any rate it was favorably reported upon.

The only difficulty in the way that I know of, is the objection which many entertain to an ordinary transfer of preemption rights before they are secured. But this is not a case of that kind. This is a case of the death of the parties who had the preemption rights, and, according to the law of my State and the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana, these rights, though not perfect, are considered a species of property. It is true, the officer of the United States may object to carrying them out in full on technical grounds, but they are very frequently sold at probate sales in the ordinary course of business in Louisiana. They certainly, according to our law, vest a right in the party. The only opposition to allowing transfers was for the purpose of preventing speculations. This is not a case of that kind. This is a case where a man has lived on and cultivated the land. He bought these rights in good faith, at probate sale, and the only objection to his not entering them by preemption right, is a technical one. All he asks is preemption rights to these tracts. I can conceive of no serious objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. ATCHISON. I have no objection to the bill, provided it is properly guarded. I have my doubts as to whether a sale, under an order of the probate court, of a preemption right, would be at all valid—whether it would transfer anything at all. Under the preemption laws, I believe, the representatives of the deceased may or may not enter. The preemption right accrues to his representatives, to his administrators, or to his widow. Now, if their rights should be protected in this bill by an amendment, I should have no objection to it. As to the small fraction of land adjoining these purchases, which the Senator mentions, I see no difficulty in the way of this man's entering it, whether he has or has not a preemption right, unless somebody else has a preemption right to it. If there is no preemption right to it, then he can enter, or any other citizen of the United States can enter, that land by paying the money for it at the land office.

Suppose this bill shall pass, authorizing Mr. McManus to enter this quantity of land, not to exceed eight hundred acres; and suppose the representatives, or the widow, or whosoever under the preemption law is entitled to enter the land, should go to the land office, make the necessary proofs, and present the money: there would be a difficulty. I see this difficulty in the way; but if the rights of these parties are guarded by an amendment, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. DOWNS. There is a provision in the bill in regard to the rights of other parties. If the Senator will allow the bill to be read again, he will see that the rights of all the other parties are sufficiently secured.

The bill was read.

Mr. ATCHISON. I have no objection to it.

Mr. FELCH. I would like to inquire what the difficulty is in the way of this person enjoying the right now to buy the land at Government price? Can he not purchase it now at $1 25 per acre?

Mr. DOWNS. I do not know what the difficulty is, but I can state several that may exist. There are many restrictions and limitations in the preemption laws. One is, that if a man owns a certain quantity of land besides that for which he claims a preemption right, he cannot enjoy the benefit of a preemption right. That may be the case with this man, for he may own more than three hundred and twenty acres besides. That would be one objection. There may be others.

He may come within some of the other exceptions made in the preëmption laws; and he asks that any exceptions of that kind may be dispensed with, and that he may be permitted to make his entry. He has what is unusual—a statement of a large number of his neighbors, some of the most respectable persons, Judge Scott among the number, in the neighborhood, confirming his statements, that nobody has any conflicting claim—that he has purchased two rights and a small fraction of vacant land adjoining, to all of which he wishes his title confirmed. He cannot enter the eight hundred acres under the preëmption laws, because they do not extend to more than one hundred and sixty acres, and there may be some difficulty arising from the transfer, although it is an everyday occurrence in our State. In Louisiana they are recognized as property, and sold at private sale for what they are worth; and it may very well happen that though the original parties holding the right of preëmption were not disqualified to make the entry, yet the person who bought in good faith, because he had more land, was prevented from making the entry.

Mr. FELCH. I observe by the reading of the bill a second time, that this land is situated within the Greensburg district of Louisiana. That is one of the districts in which there has been heretofore very great difficulty in regard to the survey of lands; and if I am not mistaken in my recollection of the matter, there was an investigation made some two or three sessions ago, and the whole region of land in that district was withdrawn from sale; so that no person can enter land within that district under any circumstances, with or without preëmption rights. I may not be entirely accurate in this respect, but I think I am. If that is so, the provisions of this bill would seem to be designed to enable the entry to be made in a region where entries cannot be made, with or without a preëmption right; but if the land is open for sale in that district, then I do not see, from anything which has been presented here, the difficulty of this McManus now going without any preëmption, and making a purchase of the land. He can purchase it if it is open to purchase. If it is not open to purchase, we ought to understand a little better the circumstances connected with the case than we do now before we pass this bill. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. DOWNS. It is unnecessary to postpone the bill, because the matter can be just as well understood now as at any other time. There can certainly be no such difficulty as is suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in regard to defective surveys. It is true that there have been many defective surveys of the lands in that district, and there has been great trouble arising out of that. Perhaps that is the reason that this person has not been able to enter these lands before. It may be that the survey of that neighborhood has not been completed, and he has not been able to enter his lands; but the bill itself prevents all difficulties of that kind, because it provides that he shall have a right to make this entry only after a duly-authenticated survey shall have been made of this township and returned. Therefore he cannot enter the lands until the surveys are made. I would mention here that I understand most of the errors in these surveys have been corrected, so that the surveys are now pretty correct. I believe it is true that at one time sales were stopped, and a great deal of money refunded; but even if the lands are open to purchase, the party is not entitled to the benefit of preëmption right for more than one hundred and sixty acres, and this land is more than that.

He would not ask for a preëmption, if he could enter the lands. If he could do that he would not ask—he would not need the interposition of Congress. The object is to enter the land before it is offered at public sale. This man has bought at probate sale, in the ordinary course of business, two purchases; he has gone on them, and cultivated them, and if we decide now, that he cannot have a preëmption under such circumstances, we decide contrary to the spirit of the laws of the State in which he resides. By some of the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana these inchoate rights have been recognized. It is a very frequent thing there for these rights to be sold at probate sale. If you refuse to pass this bill now, his house, his land which he has cultivated, may be taken from him, and occupied by somebody else.

It seems to me he presents a fair and reasonable case. Our policy has been, that persons who go on the public lands, in good faith, for the purpose of cultivating them, should have preëmption rights. I do not think I have seen a stronger case than this. There can be no doubt as to the facts, that there is no conflicting claim. Accompanying Mr. McManus's memorial, is a certificate from his neighbors, signed by Judge Scott among others, sustaining what he asserts in his memorial, and they state that they know no reason why he should not acquire a title by being allowed to enter his tracts by way of preëmption. These are the facts of the case, and I do not think there is any necessity for postponing it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Louisiana a single question? Is there any plat or survey of the land where this claim is situated? Is it ascertained at the Department, whether there is any other claim that can come in conflict with this? I do not understand that there is any plat of this land deposited in the General Land Office.

Mr. DOWNS. I do not know of any conflict; I do not know of any information before the committee on that subject. But I think there is no conflict, because if there was a conflict, it would be likely to be known to his neighbors, and there was a statement accompanying the petition from a number of his neighbors, stating that they knew of no conflict and of no objection to his request.

Mr. WALKER. For one, my opinion is that this bill ought to be further considered. If I understand it, it is nothing more nor less than this: The land can now be entered at private entry, and this is a proposition to extend the right of preëmption to one individual beyond one hundred and sixty acres, up to the amount of eight hundred acres. If the land cannot be entered at private entry, then this is a proposition to take this individual case out of the operation of the law as it now exists, and to give him the right of entering his land when no other person in the neighborhood has the same right.

Mr. DOWNS. If any other person in the neighborhood purchased from the original settler having a legal title, he would have the same right. It is because no other person is in the same situation, that he asks this privilege.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would make a suggestion to the Senator from Louisiana. After reading the report I am perfectly satisfied of the justness of the claim; but I am also exceedingly anxious to ascertain precisely what the claim is. There is nothing in the papers in the case to show whether or not eight hundred acres is the claim. Hence, if we give him a right to enter eight hundred acres it may interfere with the rights of others.

Mr. DOWNS. There is a provision in the bill, that this shall not interfere with the rights of others.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope the motion to postpone until next Friday will be agreed to, in order that we may inquire at the General Land Office, and ascertain precisely what the claim is, what are its limits, what are its bounds, and whether any other claim can interfere with it. When that shall have been satisfactorily ascertained, I suppose there will be no objection to the bill. Certainly I shall have none.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

COL. D. D. MITCHELL.

The bill for the relief of Lieut. Col. Mitchell, of the State of Missouri, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to pay off and satisfy the judgment obtained in the name of Manuel X. Harmony, against Lieut. Col. David D. Mitchell, in the circuit court for St. Louis county, in the State of Missouri, in the year 1851.

The report of the Committee on Military Affairs was read. The facts of the case appear to be these: David D. Mitchell was Lieutenant Colonel of the regiment of Missouri volunteers commanded by Col. A. M. Doniphan, which regiment was ordered to march on New Mexico. On the march to Chihuahua, Lieut. Col. Mitchell received from his superior officer, Col. Doniphan, an order which he executed by issuing an order from the camp below El Paso, on the 10th of February, 1847, directing Harmony & Co., with their teams and men, to fall in the rear, and all persons in their employ to be enrolled in the army. This order was observed until the army arrived at Chihuahua. For thus executing the orders of the commanding officer, Lieut. Col. D. D. Mitchell, after the termination of the war, being in the city of New York in the year 1849, an action of law was commenced against him in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, for said seizure. He employed counsel to defend the suit. They were aided by the district attorney of the United States for that district, under the instructions of the Government. A judgment was rendered against Mr. Mitchell for about $95,000. The Attorney General of the United States investigated the case, with the intention of taking it up to the Supreme Court, but finding no ground to justify the proceeding, it was abandoned. Col. Mitchell being a citizen of the State of Missouri, and having no property in the State of New York, a copy of the record was sent to Missouri, and a suit was instituted on the judgment obtained in New York. This suit was defended by the district attorney of the United States, under the instructions of the Attorney General, and also by able counsel employed by Col. Mitchell. The result was a judgment against him for upwards of $102,000, under which his property is liable to sale and he to pecuniary ruin, for having honestly and faithfully obeyed his superior officer, in time of war, in the country of a hostile nation. Under these circumstances, the committee were unanimously of opinion that the Government of the United States was bound to relieve Lieut. Col. Mitchell from said judgment.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

- A bill for the relief of Jane Irwin;
 - A joint resolution to authorize the continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol;
 - A bill to confirm the claim of John Irvin to a certain tract of land on the Bastrop Claim;
 - A bill for the relief of M. K. Warrington, and C. St. John Chubb, executors of Captain Lewis Warrington;
 - A bill for the relief of Frances P. Gardner; and
 - A bill for the relief William A. Richmond.
- The resolution to establish certain mail-routes was read a third time and passed.

CLAIM FOR THE OCCUPATION OF KEY WEST.

The bill for the relief of John W. Simonton was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, audit and settle the claims of John W. Simonton and others, owners of the Island of Key West, in the State of Florida, on principles of justice and equity, on account of its occupancy by the Government of the United States as a naval and military post during the years 1823, '24, '25, and '26; that in settling it upon these principles they shall ascertain, as nearly as practicable, the benefits and advantages which accrued to the United States from the occupancy of the Island, and also the injuries which resulted to the owners, and to pay the same out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to say a word against the bill, but I want to inquire whether, under that phraseology of paying money "on principles of justice and equity," the Department will or will not pay interest? I understand that, under the same phraseology in other bills, a very large sum of money for interest has been paid; and as the Senate, by a vote the other day, indicated that they would not pay interest on a claim clearly due, I want to know whether they will pay interest in this case?

Mr. MALLORY. All of the facts involved in the bill are set forth in the report. I ask that the report may be read, as Senators may not be familiar with the facts; and then I shall answer the Senator's question.

The report was accordingly read.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Florida will consent to the postponement of this bill. As it stands now, in its present shape, I feel bound to vote against it. I would like to have an opportunity of looking into the case. I hope it will be postponed.

Mr. MALLORY. I certainly did not expect to hear the slightest word of opposition to this bill. If there ever was a case presented to Congress deserving attention, it is this. This is a clear case of the taking of private property for public use, without making any compensation therefor, but, on the contrary, compensation has been withheld for over twenty years. The case has been twice before Congress, and favorable reports, almost identically the same in words, were made on both occasions. The occupation of the Island of Key West, the declaration of martial law, the using of private property for public purposes, was the means of accomplishing important ends which the Government had in view at that time, viz: the suppression of piracy in the Gulf of Mexico. The Government fully accomplished its ends, while, at the same time, the objects of the owners of the property were entirely destroyed, and all the benefits resulting from the purchase were delayed for years and years; and now they come and ask that they may be remunerated for their property thus taken. They demand no interest. I answer that question directly. They probably will receive none. They never expected any. And this bill will fail to give them what they were actually out of pocket twenty years ago. The bill does not contemplate interest. It simply contemplates that the Department shall give them dollar for dollar what they were out of pocket at that time, and no more. The owners of the property who were delayed for years and years in its enjoyment, have accumulated testimony. They have had great trouble in getting the testimony of officers of the Navy on foreign stations, and in finding the persons who were on the Island at the time. They have now, after the lapse of years, been able to complete the testimony. It is very clear there can be no doubt about the case. The facts are set forth in detail in the report which has been read. I trust there will be no opposition to it.

The bill does not, as I understand, justify the Department in paying interest. It certainly calls for none. On principles of justice and equity the loss of the property of these parties by the occupation of the Island, the stock that was killed, the interference with the sale of the property at the time, ought to be taken into consideration; but I do not think that interest will be allowed.

Mr. HALE. I am sorry to have to oppose this bill now, and perhaps I should not oppose it if it were laid over for a week. But after the history of the legislation of this Congress for the last few years, I never will go for sending a claim for consequential damages which is so great that the committee refrain from expressing an opinion, to one of the Executive officers with directions to settle it on principles of justice and equity.

That is my objection to this bill. If I am not mistaken, these very instructions to settle upon principles of justice and equity were given in the bill for the settlement of the famous Galphin claim, on which $80,000 or $90,000 interest was allowed. There is a precedent. If I am not mistaken, the phraseology of the two bills is exactly the same.

Now, if these gentlemen owning this real estate have been injured, no matter how great may be the amount, I am for paying what they have suffered, if it is a million of dollars. But I am unwilling to turn away from Congress claimants who come here with claims for consequential, remote, unliquidated damages, and turning the matter over to the Department to settle their claims "upon principles of justice and equity," without giving the accounting officers some directions, some qualifications, some limitations upon which they are to settle them. It is this loose way of doing business to which I object. I hope the Senator will consent to let this bill lie over for a week. Then we may possibly be able to understand it better.

After a few words of conversation on this suggestion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 6, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. THURSTON, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions from the Legislature of Rhode Island in favor of the retention of the act abolishing flogging in the Navy; and also for abolishing the spirit ration in all naval ships and navy-yards; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the memorial of James Pitman, for the purpose of having the claim prosecuted before the proper Department.

EXTENSION OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. McNAIR, from the committee on the extension of the Capitol, asked leave to report a resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If that is a report from a committee, it may take up the entire day with its discussion. I object to it, and move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view of taking up the bill for the assignability of land warrants.

Mr. McNAIR. It will not take up five minutes. I ask that it may be read for information.

It was read by the Clerk as follows:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to examine into the firmness and stability, &c., of the foundations for the extension of the Capitol, be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses under oath.

Mr. McNAIR. I ask that the resolution may be put on its passage; and upon that question I ask the previous question.

Mr. JONES. I have not withdrawn my objection to the introduction of the resolution. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENN. I hope the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. That Calendar is now getting full, and it is very necessary that some of the bills should be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. There being a special order before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a motion that the House resolve itself into that committee will take precedence of a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. JONES. At the suggestion of several gentlemen around me, I will withdraw my objection to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McNAIR. I now move to put the resolution upon its passage; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. PENNIMAN demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. HALL moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. If that motion prevail, what will be the order of business?

The SPEAKER. The bill for the assignability of land warrants will first come before the committee, that being the special order.

Mr. STANTON. Can we not go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar? I thought this was private bill day.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order for the gentleman to make that motion; but the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, will take precedence.

The question was then taken on the motion to go into committee; and on a division there were—ayes 82, noes 18—no quorum voting.

Mr. CLINGMAN called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes not counted.

So the motion prevailed.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, upon the special orders, (Mr. Olds in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The business before the committee is the special order, being Senate bill No. 146, making land warrants assignable, and for other purposes. When the committee rose on yesterday, there were pending, first, the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to strike out all of the bill after the first section; second, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] to strike out the second section, and insert as a substitute the second section of the bill reported by the select committee; third, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] to strike out all after the word "seven," in the sixth line of the second section, and insert "on each land warrant of forty acres, fifty cents; for each land warrant of eighty acres, $1; and for each land warrant of one hundred and sixty acres, $2;" and fourth, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLISON] to reduce one half the compensation proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT.] The first amendment pending is that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. SACKETT. I merely wish to say that the amendment proposed by me reduces already the compensation one half, and is so guarded as to make the percentage equal on all classes of warrants.

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLISON] to the amendment.

Several MEMBERS. Read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment provides for reducing the compensation of registers and receivers one half.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT,] to strike out all after the word "seven" in the sixth line, and to insert "on each land warrant of forty acres, fifty cents; for each land warrant of eighty acres, $1; and for each land warrant of one hundred and sixty acres, $2."

The question was then taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] to strike out and insert, (as reported yesterday,) and being put, the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] to strike out all of the bill after the first section as amended.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers.

Mr. CARTTER. Before that question is taken I wish to offer an amendment. The fourth section of the bill was read as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the militia or volunteers, or State troops of any State or Territory, were called into military service, and whose services have been paid by the United States, subsequent to the 18th June, 1812, the officers and soldiers of such militia, volunteers or troops, shall be entitled to all the benefits of the act entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September 28, 1850, and shall receive lands for their services according to the provisions of said act, upon proof of length of service as therein required; and that the last proviso of the ninth section of the act of the 11th of February, 1847, be, and the same is hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize bounty land to those who have heretofore received or become entitled to the same.

I propose to insert after the word "fifty," in the eleventh line of the fourth section, as follows:

And such other persons as may have performed voluntary military service in defending their homes on the frontier of the Republic against Indian invasion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman to offer an amendment to the fourth section?

Mr. CARTTER. Yes, sir, I do.

Mr. STEPHENS. Is the fourth section now under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that all the remaining sections are under consideration in consequence of the motion made to strike out all those sections.

Mr. STEPHENS. How, then, will it be if a motion is hereafter made to amend the third section? Can we go back to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the motion to strike out all after the first section brings up the consideration of all the remaining sections, and—

Mr. CARTTER. With the permission of the Chair, I will suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] that the motion to strike out all after the first section brings up all the other sections for amendment. Gentlemen have indicated no purpose to make any further amendment to the third section, and therefore amendments are in order to all the subsequent sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that if an amendment is offered to the third section, it takes preference over an amendment to the fourth section.

Mr. CARTTER. It will be perceived, by an examination of the fourth section of the bill, that it contemplates the bestowal of lands upon persons who have been temporarily called into service, and were paid by the United States. Now, the class of persons denominated in the amendment which I have just submitted to the committee, are a class who have rendered a similar, if not a superior kind of military service, but who have not been paid by the United States. The object of this fourth section, as I understand it, is especially to make a provision for the benefit of persons who have been involved in the Cherokee war. It comprehends, practically, the history of that war.

Most of the members of this House are aware how much that war has already cost us; and they are also aware how abundantly the contributions of Florida to that war have been paid out of the national Treasury; and all that I claim is, that while you are continuing to feed this demand upon the public Treasury by continually extending grants out of that Treasury in that quarter, you will just remember a hardy set of men who have retired upon the advancement of population from the shores of the Atlantic west; and holding their gun in one hand and their axe in the other, have defended their households from the presence of a destructive and merciless enemy—a class of men as much superior in all the elements of practical service to this country, to the class of men sought to be remunerated in this bill, as is imaginable; a class of men who have constituted your frontier fortifications with their naked breasts, and upon their personal prowess and personal responsibility, as civilization has advanced from the East to the West, and from the North to the South. It is the hunting-shirts that the amendment proposes to reward—men who never have carried a military cockade in their caps perchance, but who have carried their rifles in their hands, loaded ready for service—the minute men of the West—men who have not only defended it from the invasion of the enemy, but have prepared it for the occupation of civilization. That is the class of men I contemplate in the amendment I have offered; and I hope that the military chivalry which is at the bottom of this affair, will enlarge the compass of their benevolence a little, and for one period relax their military drill and comprehend this irregular force—this volunteer force—this force that marched under the command of the impulses of their hearts, and who fired without the order to fire. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to that amendment.

Mr. HALL. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] will adopt an amendment to his amendment.

Mr. CARTTER. Yes, any reasonable one.

Mr. HALL. It is to include those who were called out to defend the frontiers of Missouri from the savages of Iowa a few years ago.

Mr. CARTTER. Certainly, if they belong to my platoon. Are they of my kind?

Mr. HALL. The only difference is, that his are red savages and mine are white. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was lost.

Mr. COBB. I will inform the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER,] who talks about the Cherokee war, that—

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. COBB. I move to strike out, in the sixth line, the word "and," and insert, after the word soldiers, the words "and teamsters." I think gentlemen have spoken of the number of individuals whom this section was intended to provide for, as being individuals who were sent against the Cherokee Indians. If I have read the history of that war correctly, those Cherokee Indians were our allies. It is not, of course, designed to provide for men engaged in such a war. It is proper I should state that the fourth section of this bill proposes to provide for a portion of the army that the bill of 1850 contemplated to provide for. When that bounty land bill was under consideration, every inch of this ground was fought over. Classes of persons proposed to be provided for by the amendment to the fourth section of the bill, were endeavored to be provided for in the bill of 1850, but from the construction of the Secretary of the Interior, they have, many of them, been excluded. I am satisfied that the construction was an improper one; but notwithstanding it is so, they can now be provided for by a law, such a one as is now proposed to be inserted in the fourth section of this bill. It is true that while it is proposed to amend this law—this explanatory law—so as to embrace that portion of the military soldiers whom we intended to have provided for in the law of 1850, it is proposed by this bill to add a few more. For my own part I have no objection. I shall vote for the fourth section as it stands, and I will say to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER,] who proposes to provide for the frontier soldier who took his axe in the one hand and his gun in the other, that I am to willing to vote for a provision in the bill to give each of those individuals a quarter section of land.

Voices. "Good!" "Good!" "Good!"

Mr. C., (continuing.) I shall vote for that measure when it comes up; and then we shall be able to provide to the entire satisfaction of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER,] according to the proposition he has made; but inasmuch as it has passed away, it is not within my province to speak of it at this time. But as to my amendment: I do not see any good reasons why teamsters should not be provided for in this bill. I have been appealed to, to make provision for this class of individuals, for the reason that they are supposed to have rendered efficient service to the country in the way of their employment, in driving through the enemy's country; and to have encountered great dangers in traveling through such country, as much so as the soldier who had his musket upon his shoulder. I think they should be provided for, therefore I propose the amendment, which I hope will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise not for the purpose of arguing this question. It is manifest to the House, and to every gentleman of the House friendly to the registers and receivers of the land offices, that they cannot, in connection with this bill, effect their object. It is a notorious fact, that the recipients of the bounty land act of 1850, in consequence of the land warrants not being assignable, have sold them for one hundred per cent. less than they otherwise would have done. And I rise for the purpose of suggesting to gentlemen in favor of paying the registers and receivers, this view of the case. They differ among themselves. Gentlemen, representing in part registers and receivers, are debating this question upon the floor of this House day after day. I would suggest the propriety of ceasing their efforts, as they conflict with each other, and let us pass this bill, which is important. And I would suggest to them the further propriety of having a select committee upon the subject of paying land registers and receivers, to be constituted of members from the sections of the country interested in it; and if upon a report by them to the House they can show that the Government is either directly or indirectly bound to pay them, I have no doubt it will be done. I feel willing to vote pay to them, and if I commit an error in voting upon the claims of private individuals, I always prefer to commit that error in favor of the individual in preference to the Government. But it is impossible to pass that provision in connection with this bill; and the simple object I had in rising, was to appeal to the House to let us take the vote upon making land warrants assignable, and upon repealing that provision of the act of 1850 which confines their location to lands actually surveyed. The first section of the bill contains all the provisions that I desire, and I hope that the committee will take the question at once.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. COBB, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out in the fourth section, from the third line to the sixth, these words:

"And whose services have been paid by the United States subsequent to the 18th of June, 1812."

I do so, sir, because I perceive no propriety, if we are going to extend the provisions of the bounty land act of 1850, in limiting it to those whose services have been paid since 1812. I apprehend this was put into this bill for the purpose of eating out from the operation of the bounty land system those old veterans who served in the Indian campaign under General Wayne. I congratulate myself that I have the opportunity, by detecting this thing, to bring the Congress of the United States to a direct vote—when we are extending bounty to soldiers who have served in the wars of the country—on the proposition to extend that bounty to men who, although unfortunate in the battle of Saint Clair, yet fully redeemed the western credit and did incalculable service to the West in subsequent campaigns, under General Wayne; and I hope there will be no opposition in the committee to the extending the act or system so as to embrace them.

Mr. AVERETT. I rise, Mr. Chairman, in opposition to this amendment; and mean to oppose every amendment except the one striking out the whole of the bill after the first section as amended. We are tantalizing those who were intended to be the beneficiaries of the famous "old soldiers' bill." I find that some members feel more regard for the interests of receivers and registers of land offices, and other Government functionaries, than they do in the old soldiers, their widows and orphans. I do not, by the course I take here, mean to be understood as opposed to all of the propositions offered as amendments to this bill. There are some of them I feel inclined to vote for. But they ought to come here upon their own wheels, instead of making an omnibus of our bill, providing for the transfer of the land warrants to which no one objects. I appeal to the House to allow the seventy or eighty thousand persons who have received land warrants under the act of 1850, to make use of them in buying what they want. If the bill which went through this House at the last session had been passed, there are those now in my district who would have laid out the value of the warrants in buying the meat that is to sustain them for the present year. There are numbers who would have made use of them in the purchase of their sugar, coffee, iron, salt, and other necessities of life. Allow them that, and then you can proceed to act upon other bills. Let each proposition stand upon its own merits. If gentlemen are afraid to test them upon their own merits; and if they are determined to burden this bill down with them, it is evident they possess no merits. I hope the committee will vote down every one of them, and let us pass this bill. We will not necessarily cut off these registers and receivers by this course of proceeding, from whatever they are justly entitled to. I believe the Senate will pass our bill, simply making the warrants assignable, as provided in this first section as amended. I do not believe the Senate will again, and for the third time, defeat this popular measure, by riding it to death with extraneous matters.

Mr. HALL. Is an amendment to the amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HALL. I then move to amend the words proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Kentucky by striking out "1812," and inserting instead the words "subsequent to 1800."

Mr. H. If the gentleman from Kentucky be right in supposing the clause in the bill would exclude those men who served under General Wayne, I am perfectly willing there shall be a provision inserted to cover them. I am, however, of the opinion that the gentleman is wrong in the supposition that this class would be excluded under that clause, and if the gentleman will reflect—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The clause excludes all anterior to the war of 1812.

Mr. HALL. I only want to say this, that I think the gentleman from Kentucky cannot have considered the effect of this provision, for if I understand the matter right he otherwise would not have proposed it.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is not in the House bill, but the Senate bill.

Mr. HALL. I understand that he proposes to give bounty lands to all those whose services were not paid for by the United States. Now, who will this clause embrace? I have not read the amendment distinctly, but I think it will embrace all those called out in the Mormon war, and all those called out in the Iowa war.

Mr. STEPHENS. Were those soldiers the gentleman speaks of mustered into the service of the United States, and actually paid?

Mr. HALL. No. The gentleman from Kentucky proposes that that clause which requires they shall have been mustered into the United States service and paid, be stricken out.

Mr. STEPHENS. He barely moves to strike out that which restricts it to the war of 1812. That is all.

Mr. HALL. It may be that I misunderstand it. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as reported above.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will modify my amendment, to strike out the words "and whose services have been paid by the United States subsequent to the 18th of June, 1812," so as to make it read:

And be it further enacted, &c., That in all cases where the militia or volunteers or State troops of any State or Territory were called into military service, &c.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I propose—

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion upon the amendment is not in order, as the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, being accepted by the gentleman from Kentucky, becomes part of his amendment, and upon that amendment the discussion is ended.

Mr. EVANS. I propose an amendment to the amendment, by striking out the words "and whose services have been paid by the United States."

I only want to say, sir, that it strikes me as a very funny affair to require that a man shall not have bounty land unless he has charged the Government heretofore—unless he has received pay as a soldier. We have a large number of people in my State who never asked the Government for a dollar of pay. A large number of the people, at a time of danger, turned out willingly. A new rule is laid down now, that a man is not to get anything unless he has heretofore got all he can get from the Government for his services. That is the doctrine, and there is no sense or justice in it. A man who served his country without compensation, is more entitled to bounty land than those who came forward for pay. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] to strike out the words, "and whose services have been paid by the United States subsequent to the 18th of June, 1812," ought certainly to be passed. Perhaps it would be as well to insert before that "military service of the United States," so as not to include the soldiers of Missouri, who were engaged in the Iowa war. I do not see why evidence should be required of a soldier, in order to justify the granting of bounty land, that he has served the United States and has been actually paid. He must have received pay, according to this, before he can get any bounty land. He must already have had his hand in the Treasury before he can get a tract of land in the western country upon which to locate himself in his old age. That is the doctrine of this bill. If he has given gratuitous services to his country, if he has turned out in the hour of need and danger, when he was prosperous and affluent, and chose to demand no compensation now, that should not preclude him when he may be in want from receiving under this bill. I see no sort of reason for the words remaining in the section, and move that they be stricken out; and I hope the committee will put in the third line the words "military service of the United States," so as to exclude the gallant Mormon soldiers of Missouri.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL,

Mr. GOODENOW demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. CHANDLER and HARRIS of Tennessee, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 64, noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to insert in the thirteenth line of the fourth section, after the word "require," the following:

And that the provisions of the fifth section of the act of July 9th, 1848, granting three months extra pay to the soldiers and officers of the Mexican war, be extended so as to include the North Carolina recruits taken into service by Lieutenant James W. Tatham, and discharged at Fort Moultrie after nearly twelve months service.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a point of order. That amendment, as I understand it, is upon the subject of three months' extra pay, upon a different subject, and cannot be incorporated in this bill, I believe.

Mr. CLINGMAN. This I understand to be a bill giving bounty lands to soldiers, and no one will doubt but what we might substitute scrip or money, as was formerly done. The object is to give bounty to the soldier, whether it be three months' extra pay, or in the shape of lands. I take it the amendment is perfectly germane to the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The point of order is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the amendment is in order.

Mr. JONES. From that decision, I take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Chair supposes that, as regards the subject of bounty, it will be in order to make it either in money or land. From that decision the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] takes an appeal. The question, then is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. LOCKHART and WILLIAMS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 66.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled.

Mr. EVANS. I propose to offer the following amendment to the 4th section:

And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act of September 28th, 1850, are hereby extended to all mariners, marines, flotilla men and seamen, who have heretofore served with the land forces, in cases where the said persons were not entitled to prize money.

And be it further enacted, That a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land is hereby granted to all persons who were in any actual engagement or conflict with the enemy, whether the said persons served less or more than one month, provided that said persons shall not receive more than one bounty land warrant for his services in any one war.

Mr. E. I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the committee. The Department recommends both of these provisions. The first embraces those men who belonged to the marine service, and acted with the land forces on shore, and who are not entitled to any prize money. We have a precedent for this: sailors in the Mexican war, whether they served upon land or not, received bounty land. I do not now ask the same thing should be extended to those who served in the war of 1812; but I ask that those who go on shore, enlist and serve with the land troops, as our sailors did in 1812, and in the Florida war, and where, by no possibility, could they gain any prize money, should receive their bounty land. This would benefit General Barney's men, who were among a few who fought at Bladensburg, and yet who are the only persons in that battle excluded from bounty. I think this would be just; and the number of persons to be benefited is not large. The next class for whom I ask bounty land is composed of those persons who have been in actual battles with the enemy, whether they served a month or not. Now, it must strike every man's sense of justice and notions of propriety, that a man who has been in battle is as well entitled to his bounty land as if he had served five years in the army of the United States, and had never been engaged in battle. By the law as it now stands, those who have been in battle, and have served less than one month, are excluded from the bounty.

There is a large class of such persons in my own State, and in many of the Eastern States. Admiral Cockburn lay with several thousand men in Chesapeake bay for a long time, and you could never tell where he would attempt to land. He made predatory incursions, burnt towns, and committed many acts of violence. Our people had to turn out as minute men. Thousands of them never received a dollar from the United States for their services. And yet they were engaged in several warm engagements. Both of these provisions come recommended by the Department of the Interior—both are palpably just in themselves, including, as they do, a meritorious class of persons.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think the committee had better vote down all amendments, having for their object the extension of the bounty land law, as it now exists, and take a direct vote upon the proposition made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], to strike out all after the first section. If a majority of the committee are in favor of that motion, then we will get a vote upon the main question in this bill, that is, to make bounty lands assignable. We can send that bill to the Senate, and the next bill in order, which is the special order of the House, will then come up. If there is a majority of the House in favor of extending the bounty land act, as I am myself, then we can do it in that bill. Let me appeal to gentlemen to disencumber the provision making land warrants assignable, of all these amendments; come to a direct vote upon the bill, send it back to the Senate, and then we can take up the bill, which extends the bounty land act.

Mr. CHASTAIN. The Senate have rejected it. Mr. STEPHENS. The Senate have not rejected it. My colleague is mistaken.

Mr. CHASTAIN. Will they hold on to it?

Mr. STEPHENS. They keep that bill in terrorem over us, and it is announced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL], that in no event would they pass it, unless we pay those registers and receivers. As to this question, I am willing to take issue with the gentleman. So far as I am concerned, I am determined that I will never give these receivers the compensation they claim in order to pass our bill making land warrants assignable.

Mr. STUART. I should like to learn from the message, which was sent here from the Senate, whether it is the fact that this is a new bill. I believe that it is the same bill which passed this House with amendments.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. STUART. Oh, no. I merely want to learn that fact.

The question was then taken on Mr. EVANS's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WILCOX. I move to amend the second section of the bill by striking therefrom the words "next of kin."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is not now in order to amend the second section of the bill, as the committee has passed to the consideration of the fourth section.

Mr. WILCOX then submitted a pro forma amendment to the fourth section, and said: I wish merely to submit one reflection for the consideration of the House. It seems to me, from the very great conflict of opinion entertained here by gentlemen who desire to advance the interests and claims of the registers and receivers, that this bill will fail to pass. Now, I am one of those who are in favor of doing the greatest good to the greatest number, and at the same I desire to do injustice to no man. The reflection which I wish to submit to the House is this: upon the one hand there are some one hundred receivers to be benefited by this bill; and upon the other hand there are some one hundred and fifty thousand soldiers, or persons who are the heirs of soldiers, interested in the passage of this bill. Now, I want to know if those one hundred and fifty thousand individuals who have performed services for their country, are to suffer, in order that the interests of one hundred receivers may be advanced?

Permit me to say that I have not received a mail from my State since my arrival in this city, that has not contained letters calling upon me to use every effort in my power to procure the passage of a bill making these land warrants assignable, and by virtue of my position on the Committee on Military Affairs, I have received letters of the same purport from various parts of the United States.

I concur most fully in the sensible position taken by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] in regard to this bill. I do hope that the House will agree to strike out all save the first section of the bill, as it must be evident to every one that it is impossible to pass the bill in its present shape.

I am in favor of compensating these receivers. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," is a trite old maxim; but at the same time I would leave that subject for special legislation, and now pass the first section of this bill.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 32.

Mr. MASON. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, because I am opposed to all amendments and in favor of passing nothing except the first section of the bill. I am disposed to act in such a way as will secure the speedy passage of the bill. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSSELL] is thoroughly advised and authorized by the Senate, or any members of the Senate who have sufficient influence to defeat the passage of this bill, to say that it will be defeated if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] prevails, I should like to know who those members are. It is charged that there has been a combination in the Senate that has for the last two years defeated this measure, and prevented the warrants from being made assignable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. In the first place, the action of the Senate is not a legitimate subject for this House to inquire into.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order a good one. The gentleman has no right to impugn the motives of the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I have no disposition to violate the rules of the House.

Mr. BISSSELL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to answer his interrogatory?

Mr. MASON. I shall be glad to hear it answered.

Mr. BISSSELL. The gentleman asks me whether I am authorized by the Senate to say that this bill cannot pass that House without the provision for the compensation of registers and receivers.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) I rise to a point of order, although I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BISSSELL. I am surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky should ask me that question—

Mr. HOUSTON. I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman, but this mode of debate has gone so far that it seems to me it ought to be stopped. It is a reference to the Senate with a view to affect the legislation of the House, and that I understand to be against the rules of the House, as it certainly is against the universal practice. I did not say anything when this kind of debate was indulged in yesterday, but I think it has gone too far.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that a gentleman offering an amendment must speak to that amendment, and then one gentleman may speak in opposition to it, but the rule confines them strictly to the merits or demerits of the particular amendment. The Chair has been waiting for some time for some gentleman to raise that point.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not raise that point. My point of order is, that it is out of order to refer to what the Senate may do upon the matter on which we are acting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so ruled. Mr. BISSSELL. I should like to be permitted to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MASON. I should like the gentleman to answer it. I should like to know who it is in the Senate that have made a combination to defeat this bill unless the receivers come in for their share. It may be that some of these land receivers may have a very potent influence in the Baltimore or Philadelphia conventions, but then the soldiers and their friends are just as potent in confirming the nominations of those conventions. There has been long enough delay already in the passage of this bill. I approve of the provisions offered by my colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and by various other gentlemen, to extend the bounty land law. I shall be willing, at the proper time and in the proper bill, to vote to extend that law to the adult heirs of all deceased soldiers, because I believe that the heirs of those who have fallen in battle are just as much entitled to bounty lands as those soldiers who were so fortunate as to escape unhurt. But I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, that we ought now to pass the first section of this bill, to make these warrants assignable. If it is defeated in the Senate, let the responsibility rest upon those Senators who have made a combination to defeat it. I want to smoke out the combination to defeat this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken on Mr. Wilcox's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN moved to insert after the word "troops," in line seven of section four, the words:

And the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the company commanded by Captain St. Vrain, which served in New Mexico in the year 1847, against the enemies of the United States, and whose services have not been paid for by the Government of the United States.

Mr. W. said: The object of that amendment is to include the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the company commanded by Captain St. Vrain, which has never been paid by the Government of the United States. That whole company, with perhaps a few exceptions, served under the command of Colonel Sterling Price, for a period of one month; they subjected themselves to discipline in every way, as if they had been regularly mustered into service—indeed I am not prepared to say that they were not mustered into service. During the month for which they served they were engaged in three battles—the battles of La Cañada, La Embuda, and Pueblo de Taos—the latter particularly a very hard-fought battle. They never received any compensation whatever from the Government of the United States, and I hope they will be included in this bill.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise for the purpose of appealing to the House to expedite the passage of this bill, for the parties who are to be benefited by it are, many of them, really suffering for the want of some such provision as it contains. I think it is the duty of the House to pass the bill as speedily as possible, and I am opposed to all amendments that delay our action upon it. I should like to see the bill amended by striking out all but the first two sections. Those two sections are all that the soldiers ask for. One of those sections proposes to make the land warrants transferable, and the other to give compensation in future to the receivers and registers for locating those warrants. Those two sections belong legitimately together, but the other sections are separate and distinct propositions, and should be stricken out of this bill: I believe that by striking out all but those first two sections, we shall facilitate the action of the House and give the bill such a shape as will meet the views of a majority of the members on this floor.

Gentlemen from all parts of the country agree that the soldiers for whose benefit these land warrants were issued, are extremely anxious that the warrants should be made transferable. There is no question about the propriety of making them so, and hence I think that it is clearly our duty so to act as to secure the speedy passage of a bill to effect that object.

The time consumed in talking on this subject and offering amendments to the bill may not be of much consequence to us, but it is of consequence to the men for whose benefit this action of the House is demanded. Whilst we are talking they are starving. Many of them are in destitute circumstances, and some of them are almost in a state of starvation; and I therefore ask the House to pass the first two sections without further delay, and leave the other features of the bill for future action.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I wish to say a single word upon this amendment before the question is taken.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, announcing that they had passed a bill for the establishment of certain post routes.]

Mr. BISSSELL. I propose an amendment to the fourth section. I propose to insert in the fourth line, after the word "paid," the words, "or which shall hereafter be paid;" so as to provide that the troops, militia, or volunteers, or State troops of any State or Territory, whose services have been paid, or which shall be hereafter paid by the United States, shall be entitled to all the benefits of the act of 1850.

Mr. Chairman, it has been stated here that there are about one hundred registers and receivers who will be recipients under this bill, if passed in its present shape. That is an exaggerated statement of the number by about one third, or more. But suppose it to be one hundred, I call the attention of the members of this committee to the consequence of passing this bill in its present shape. If we pass it without providing for their compensation, we shall have, at different times, at least one hundred applications to Congress from these registers and receivers for extra compensation, and we shall spend more money and more time in legislating upon these different bills during the next five years—for the applications will certainly be presented here—than four times the amount which is required to be appropriated for their payment. It cannot be otherwise. These men cannot fail to know that they have an honest claim upon the Government. Some of them have spent three years of their lives in the employment of the Government in locating these lands; for which they have not received, I repeat again and again, $200 a year above the necessary clerk-hire. Now, will it not be as I have stated? Will not these men, their widows, their representatives, or their orphan children, come up here to Congress year after year, session after session, and clamor for their compensation, unless we make provision in this bill for that compensation?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call the gentleman to order. We have already passed that section of the bill relating to the compensation of registers and receivers, and it is not in order for the gentleman from Illinois to discuss it now.

Mr. BISSSELL. I was giving a reason why the amendment which I proposed should be adopted.

Mr. JONES. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. BISSSELL. My remarks are perfectly in order. If the amendment which I have proposed be adopted, it will make the bill acceptable, and it will then, I believe, pass the House.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. I insist that my point of order shall be decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSSELL,] proposed an amendment with regard to the payment of troops, and he is making a speech with regard to the payment of receivers. The Chair thinks that the gentleman's remarks are not relevant to his amendment.

Mr. BISSSELL. I offer these remarks as a reason why my amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to his amendment. The Chair will remark again, that he shall feel it his duty to confine the remarks of gentlemen speaking in favor of an amendment to a mere statement of their reasons why it should be adopted; and those opposed to it, to a statement of the reasons why it should not be adopted.

Mr. BISSSELL. Well, if the amendment which I have proposed be adopted, I think the bill can obtain a majority of the votes of the House. I think it ought to obtain a majority of our votes; I think it ought to pass for the reasons which I have given. If it do not pass, we shall hereafter necessarily expend more money and more time in legislating upon this subject, which we are now discussing, than four times the $100,000 which it is proposed to be appropriated for the compensation of these officers.

Mr. SWEETSER. I do not know that it would become me to express the surprise I feel at the train of argument which has been indulged in by the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSSELL,] But I rise for the purpose of appealing to this committee, to every intelligent and patriotic gentleman here, to know if they are prepared to listen with any favor to such a strain of remark as has been indulged in by the gentleman from Illinois? As was remarked on yesterday, the gentlemen who have advocated the various propositions in relation to the payment of registers and receivers of the different land offices, have presented nothing but discord from the beginning of the session down to the present moment. There has been no concert of action or sentiment among them. But, on yesterday, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] was understood to offer a threat, that unless these measures were ingrafted upon the bill making land warrants assignable, that it would fail to pass the House, and when that point was made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], I thought that would be the end of such a course of argument. But now the gentleman from Illinois offers another amendment, and on it repeats his demonstrations of yesterday. After all the propositions for the payment of these registers and receivers have met with no favor here, for the purpose of still further enforcing the argument, he tells this House and the country that, after this demonstration, unless we ingraft this proposition upon the bill, the bill will not only be defeated, but that Congress will be burdened, now and for all time to come, with these various applications of registers and receivers for compensation. Now I beg gentlemen to reflect on this course of argument. Are the American Congress to be told here, that if they will not tack upon a bill all sorts of irrelevant propositions and those which have not sufficient merit in them to meet the approbation of a majority of this body—that unless we do that, the men who have these propositions will urge them to such an extent that they will become incumbrances to the legislation of the country—to such an extent they will break down all opposition? Sir, such appeals as these, in my judgment, ought not to be made to this House. It seems to me that this question has been carried to a point of desperation upon the part of these gentlemen. Now I call upon gentlemen who desire to see this bill pass, to fall back upon the provision which seemed to meet the wishes of a majority of the committee on yesterday—simply to make land warrants assignable. Beyond that point gentlemen cannot agree upon the various propositions presented, and beyond that point I believe the majority of the committee are determined not to go. There is a disposition in Congress—both in this and in the other end of the Capitol—to pass a measure so meritorious as this. But I believe any proposition, beyond that of merely making the warrants assignable, will not meet a general concurrence. Upon that point I take my position, and turn my back upon all propositions to go further. I assert my right, and I mean to maintain it. I will not be driven from my position, and I hope the committee will not be driven from its position. If gentlemen intend still to come forward with these various propositions, I tell them to beware how they attempt to force their conclusions upon this committee or upon the country. [Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken upon Mr. BISSELL's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SAVAGE. I have an amendment to offer. I move the following, to come in at the end of the fourth section:

That the officers, non commissioned officers, and privates of the Marine Corps, engaged in the service of the United States in the late war with Mexico, on the line of operations between the city of Vera Cruz and the city of Mexico, and in case of death, then the widow and heirs at law be allowed the benefits of an act, approved the 28th of September, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers, who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

Mr. S. said: I offer the amendment for the purpose of saying, that the bill now before us would not effect all the good that might be accomplished, yet it demanded our action, and would secure much that the constituents of many gentlemen were pressing upon them.

Its friends propose to make the warrants assignable, and provide for their location, and this puts the matter in the same condition as when it passed this House at the first session of the last Congress. I will vote for the bill in this shape, because it meets the necessity of the present moment, and does not prevent a more extended legislation hereafter. I should be glad to accomplish more, but think it best to secure what we can.

I am for the most liberal legislation in favor of those who have done service for the country, not only from inclination, but as a matter of policy. The public lands are to be disposed of, and I have my choice among donees. I prefer the claims of the man who has periled himself in our service, I care not who he is. I am for the marine, as well as the soldier; for well I remember when your Capitol was to be defended, the only spot upon the battle-field where the eye of an American could rest without shame, was defended by seamen. But while we struggle for things now unattainable, we may lose that which is within our reach.

The question was then taken upon Mr. SAVAGE's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM. I feel it my duty to offer for the consideration of the committee, one amendment more, which, I think, is very meritorious. It is to strike out the third section, and insert the amendment which I send to the Speaker's table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. We have passed the third section, and—

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I propose to add to the fourth section of the bill, the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That in computing the term of service the officers and soldiers of militia, volunteers, and rangers, for the purposes of this act, or of the act of which this act is explanatory, such term shall be computed from the time they were mustered into the service of and paid by the United States at the time they were discharged therefrom: Provided, That this section shall not extend to the cases provided for by the provisions to the first section, and by the second section of the act approved the 28th of September, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

Mr. D. said: I presume, from the indications this morning, that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to strike out all except the first section is to prevail. But I desire to offer this amendment, for I have no doubt that if it is properly understood by the committee, and if the bill is to pass at all, they will be perfectly willing that this amendment shall go with it. It is to provide for those troops which were engaged in the Black Hawk war. There were many companies of rangers called out for that service. They served in the war until peace was concluded some two or three months. They had enlisted, however, as rangers for twelve months. After peace was concluded, they were occupied in active service upon the frontier, for the whole twelve months for which they enlisted. The construction of the Department, as put upon the act of 1850, which is, that soldiers are only entitled to receive bounty land for the time the war actually existed, cuts them off with forty acres of land, whereas a proper interpretation of the act would give them one hundred and sixty. The intention of the amendment I have offered is, to enable these men to receive one hundred and sixty acres of land for their whole twelve months' service which they rendered, and which was of the most arduous and laborious character. It was not only laborious, but it was a service for which they were inadequately compensated. They received certain monthly wages, but out of that they had to provide provender for their own horses, for it must be remembered that they were all mounted troops. It took nearly the whole of those wages to pay the expenses they were obliged to pay in order to support themselves and their horses. They received, then, comparatively nothing for their services, and they are turned off, under the construction of the law by the Department, with only forty acres of land, notwithstanding they performed twelve months arduous services.

While I am up, I wish to call the attention of the committee to a matter which passed between my colleague and myself on yesterday. It is the letter I referred to as having been received from the Commissioner of the Land Office. I stated that the letter showed that the receivers of the land offices performed comparatively no labor in the location of these warrants. That letter does show that fact. It shows that they receive any money that is paid into the land offices, and it is their obvious duty to receive and take charge of all the moneys which may be made as overplus between the amount of land warrants and the amount of land entered at the offices. As a matter of course, they get their percentage. One duty for them is to examine the quarterly returns once in three months, and put their signatures upon them. Another duty is to sit upon the Board where there is a conflict as to preemption right. For instance, here is a person who claims a preemption right, and another individual desires to locate it with a land warrant. A board is organized to decide whether the claimant is entitled to a preemption right or not. The receiver constitutes one of that Board, and such a case does not probably occur in one out of six thousand locations. A man does not want to enter a section of land with a warrant when he sees that in doing so there will be a controversy between him and a preemption claimant as to the title. The letter which I received from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I will send to the table, that every member may see that I was warranted in the statement I made yesterday.

The letter is as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, January 15, 1852.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry as to the duties performed by receivers in locating military bounty land warrants, I have the honor to state, that the only labor required of these officers is the following: To receive the money and issue a receipt for the excess of land located beyond that called for by the warrant: To examine the warrant located, with the register's return thereof at the close of each month, so as to be enabled to join the register in the certificate as to the correctness of the return; and to set with him as a portion of the Board to examine and adjudicate upon testimony submitted when the location made by the holder of a warrant is contested by another upon the ground of its embracing his actual settlement and cultivation without his consent.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
J. BUTTERFIELD, Commissioner.

Hon. C. L. DUNHAM, House of Representatives.

Mr. BRENTON. I suppose my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] did not allude to me in his remarks, but to my friend over the way, [Mr. FRICK], as I have not called the attention of the committee to the duties of the receivers of land offices. I wish simply to state, in a very few words, that a part of the statement professing to have come from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in reference to the duties of the receiver in locating bounty land warrants, is correct. But it does not cover the whole case, and I presume that had the proper question been propounded by the gentleman, in his search after knowledge to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that he would have obtained all the facts in the case. I understand the gentleman to state, that the letter shows that the duty of the receiver, so far as he is connected with the location of land warrants is concerned, is simply to sign his name to the monthly abstract, nothing more. Now, I undertake to say, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office will not dare to contradict me in reference to it, that in the case of every land warrant located, the receiver has to inspect it, and sign his name upon the face of it three distinct and different times, and if such a warrant is not returned here to the Commissioner, with the three distinct signatures upon it by the receiver, it will be returned to be amended. He has to sign it at the time of the application; he has to sign it when it is received to certify that this location is correct, and lastly, he has to sign it by certifying at the bottom thereof that the location is according to law. In addition to this, at the end of every month the receiver visits the register's office, and the warrants are taken up one at a time, and compared with the monthly abstract, the Tract Book and with the plats, in order to ascertain that the location does not interfere with any location before made. These are the duties of the receiver. It is also made a part of his duty to join with the register in certifying that the examination has been made, and that the locations are made in accordance with the provisions of the law. I make these statements in regard to the duties of receivers of land offices, knowing that the Commissioner of the General Land Office will not controvert them.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman makes the remark, that if I had made the proper inquiry of the Commissioner, he would have given me a different answer. I have only to say that my inquiry was made in person of the Commissioner as to what were the duties performed by the receivers in the land offices. That letter which I have sent to the table is the answer I received.

Mr. BRENTON. If the gentleman had called upon him to furnish a located land warrant he would have seen upon the paper itself the very facts which I have stated, and the Commissioner will not controvert them.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. DUNHAM; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I presume it will be in order to move to strike out all after the third section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order.

Mr. CLARK. I propose, then, as an amendment, to strike out all after the third section. I wish to utter but a word or two upon this subject; but I will state that I make this proposition in good faith. I think it is worthy the serious and favorable consideration of the House. It is manifest that there is a great variety of views arising upon the different provisions of the bill. It is manifest that there is a majority in favor of the first section of the bill, which provides for making land warrants assignable. It is doubtful whether there is a majority in favor of paying registers and receivers, and still more doubtful whether there is a majority in favor of issuing a new class of land warrants. Now, I ask gentlemen of the committee if we cannot compromise upon the three first sections of this bill—that is, upon the sections providing for making land warrants assignable, for paying registers and receivers for past services and for future services?

I have no thought myself of being generous before I am just. As between man and man, let us dispense justice, and let grace come afterwards. What is the original granting of bounty land warrants but a mere gratuity? It is that, and nothing else. But to that I do not object. It is another gratuity to make them assignable, because you add facilities thereby to enable those to whom you have extended the favor of the Government to obtain still greater favors. To this, by itself, I have no objection. But I do object, and I think justly, to a course of legislation which, with one hand, grants gratuities to one class of citizens, and at the same time imposes corresponding burdens upon others. Have you a right to dispense bounty land warrants, as you have done, and in the very act compel your employees to perform a larger amount of services, without any reasonable compensation whatever? Is that just and right? Does it commend itself to the good consciences of gentlemen here? I cannot see upon what principle it does, nor upon what principle it appeals either to the good judgment or the good feelings of gentlemen. Now, if you have required a certain class of your employees to perform a large amount of labor, why not pay them? It was said by the gentleman over the way, [Mr. JOHN W. HOWE,] yesterday, that if registers and receivers are not satisfied with the compensation which they are receiving, let them resign. I ask, were they under any obligation to suppose that such an argument would be urged against them, or to conclude that the Government would not do them justice? Why, let me say that the various committees of this House are employed every day in canvassing the claims of those who suppose that they have claims upon the Government, and deciding as to whether they shall not make such claimants whole, and grant them compensation for services rendered. Now, if gentlemen can tell me that these men were under obligations to have believed that this Government would refuse to make them compensation, then there would have been force in the remark which has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHN W. HOWE,] and by other gentlemen.

Mr. GOODENOW. If I rightly understand the proposition of the honorable member from Iowa, it is to strike out the last two sections, the fourth and fifth, leaving only the first three sections. To this proposition I am opposed, as it is the only part of the bill which will enable any portion of the citizens of my State to receive any benefit from it. I am persuaded there exists a very general desire throughout the country that land warrants may be made assignable. I was inclined to the opinion that the bill from the Senate ought to receive the concurrence of the House, and I was disposed to vote in favor of it, but when I observe gentlemen from various portions of the country proposing so many amendments, and differing so widely as to their justice and propriety, I have come to the conclusion that the best way is to pass the Senate bill without amendment; if that cannot be done, then to strike out all but this first section, which alone seems to meet with general acceptance.

If this general scramble to obtain the lands of the United States is to continue, and be successful, it is no more than fair and right that the Northern and Eastern States shall come in for a share; and if there is any portion of this bill which will extend a benefit to any portion of the citizens of my State, I am most assuredly opposed to striking that part out. It is my desire that we may come speedily to a vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] to strike out all but the first section of the Senate bill.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CLARK,] and it was disagreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the fourth section of the bill:

Except so far as to give them any additional amount of land, to which the services provided for in this section may entitle them; the aggregate of land in no one case to exceed one hundred and eighty acres.

You will perceive the proviso to this section provides "that nothing herein contained shall authorize bounty land to those who have heretofore received or become entitled to the same." Under a construction of the previous law, I believe by the Commissioner of Pensions, or perhaps the Secretary of the Interior, a person having served at two or more different times is permitted to select the longer period of service upon which to receive his warrant, or the Commissioner puts two or more of these terms together and issues to him a warrant to which the aggregate time would entitle him. Those provided for by the section could not be recipients in the manner indicated under this construction, for if they served previously and received forty acres, and were entitled under this section to forty additional acres, they could not obtain it, and the object of my amendment is simply to permit them to obtain that number of acres which the aggregate time of their services would allow them.

I am sorry to be compelled again to allude to my colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM,] because he thinks I did not do it yesterday in that spirit of courtesy which should be extended from one to the other of the members of the House. But I presume the exceptions taken by him to-day, to the statement in relation to the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office by myself, were intended to apply to me. I did state, on yesterday, and I should not hesitate much to repeat it now, that the letter which he produced here in support of his statement that receivers did nothing, or little short of nothing in the location of bounty land warrants, was not sustained by the letter itself. That letter did not go into details of the service rendered by the receiver. I then had a letter, which is now in the possession of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which states that the duties of the register and receiver are almost identical, and that they are nearly or quite quadruple the duties of the same officers when the sales of land are for cash. I profess to be willing to compensate registers and receivers for past and prospective service in locating these bounty land warrants, but the provision for their compensation in this bill is objected to. This objection, I apprehend, is a mere subterfuge, and come up in what shape it would, the proposition for compensating these men would be met with objections on the part of certain gentlemen. If they are willing to compensate them, why not do it now, in connection with a matter pertaining to bounty land warrants?

A word, sir, as to the combination here, and in the other end of the Capitol, to connect the provision for the compensation of registers and receivers with this bill, which prevails so largely in the imagination of some gentlemen upon the floor, and I expect it exists nowhere else than in their imagination. No such combinations exist to my knowledge, and I believe it has no existence outside their prolific brains. But if it does exist, it is a combination of the friends of a class of United States officers who have been legally robbed, they having accepted office under a law which has been since changed, having accepted office from the Government with the expectation of receiving the fees to which they were entitled by law, and of which they were subsequently deprived by the action of that very Government, in changing the manner of selling lands, thus depriving them of that compensation which they had every right to expect. It was asked by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] why, when they became aware that they were not receiving compensation enough, they did not resign? Before they were aware of the effect of these bounty land bills upon their compensation, they had rendered service to a large amount; and they held on to the office in the expectation, which I fear is likely to be a vain one, that the Government would do them justice—would compensate them for the services they have honestly rendered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have not engaged heretofore in the discussion of this bill, and I only wish now to call the attention of the committee to a single matter of fact, which is in opposition to the amendment only in this respect: that it is no use for us to support any other amendment which may be offered here. We may as well take this bill as it is. A motion is either pending, or very shortly to be made, upon the decision of which, the bill goes one way or the other. Those who are opposed to the bill have ceased, since we passed the first section, to offer amendments, and I would suggest to the friends of the measure to let the vote be had now upon the motion. It is hardly worth while for them to delay it. The crisis of the bill must come upon one motion, and that is the motion to strike out all of the bill after the first section. For my own part, I am extremely anxious that the Senate bill shall pass as it has come to us. There is no use in the friends of the measure consuming further time in delaying the vote upon the motion to strike out. There is no use of offering amendments when we know they cannot be carried, whether reasonable or unreasonable. I hope we may have a vote on the bill, and that it may be disposed of.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. FITCH, and it was rejected.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, to strike out all of the bill after the first section.

Mr. FOWLER demanded teller; which were ordered, and Messrs. FOWLER and CARTER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, the tellers having reported—ayes 106, noes 38.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the committee rise, and report the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. BARRERE. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes it is not in order, the committee having stricken out all after the first section.

Mr. BARRERE. I wish to add a new section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order.

Mr. SWEETSER. I rise to a point of order. We have amended the first section, and passed upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. This is proposed as an additional section.

Mr. BARRERE. I offer the following as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That if any officer or soldier, who would, if living, be entitled to bounty land under the several acts to which this act is an amendment, has died since the rendition of the services by which he would be so entitled, and who has left no widow now living, that the warrant to which he would if living be so entitled, shall issue first to his heirs-at-law in a descending line, if he shall have left any such heirs; and if he shall have left no such heirs who still survive, that such warrant shall issue to the father of such officer or soldier, or if the father be dead, then that the same shall issue to the mother of such officer or soldier. And if the mother be dead, in the last place, that such warrant shall issue to the brothers and sisters of such officer or soldier, if any still survive.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I make a point of order upon that amendment. The bill as now amended authorizes the sale and transfer by assignment of land warrants. The effect of the gentleman's motion is to bring new matter into the bill. All that part relating to the amendment now proposed, having been stricken out, I think it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds the amendment to be in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My point of order is, that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BARRERE. I think it is perfectly germane.

Mr. MASON. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides, that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BARRERE] is in order. From that decision the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] takes an appeal. The question is, Shall the opinion of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was then taken upon the appeal, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BARRERE. I think the motion I made is perfectly germane. As this bill authorizes land warrants to be issued and made assignable, it is proper, I think, that we should extend this privilege as far as the principles of this are required to be extended. I am not favorable to a system of bounty lands, but inasmuch as we have such a system we should have it predicated upon such principles as will operate fairly upon all classes alike. Now, I cannot see any reason why the officers or soldiers who served in the late war, and who have died and left minor children, should receive any advantage from this bounty land act, while the heirs of the officers and soldiers who have served in St. Clair's campaign, in Hemar's campaign, in 1811, when there was an Indian war in the State of Indiana, and those too who served in the war of 1812, who have died and have not happened to leave minor children and widows, do not get any of the benefits of the act. The heirs of none of these persons get any land warrants. I have received more letters upon this subject than upon the subject of making warrants assignable. There are cases in the section of country which I represent, where soldiers who served in the campaigns of Hamar, St. Clair, and Wayne, and in 1812, 1813, and 1814, to which I have alluded, have died, leaving widows, who are now deceased also, and where the heirs-at-law do not derive any benefit from this bounty land law. Now, if these lands are given by the United States to pay for services which these men have rendered, and if they deserve such bounty for their services, I think that justice requires that the heirs of these persons should be entitled to the benefits of such bounty. I think the heirs-at-law of those men, who settled in the western country and turned out in its defence in the various wars that have taken place, are as much entitled to their complement of land, as are the widows of the soldiers themselves. I think if we will look upon it in that light, that we will make the bill in form as it ought to be. I should have been far from offering this proposition at this time, had I not been induced to do so by the numerous letters I have received from my district, and from the belief that the wishes of my district expressed in those letters is in accordance with the true principles that ought to be ingrafted into this bill.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BARRERE:]

And that if any person who may be entitled to bounty land under the act of September 28, 1850, shall die after his application and completion of proof, the land certificate so granted shall descend to, and may be located by his heirs or legal representatives.

I desire to state to the House this fact, and I state it because the cases arose under my own observation. There have passed through my hands to the Commissioner of Pensions, quite a number of applications for bounty lands. I have had some half dozen cases, where the applicants have died since filing their declarations, which have laid in the office for some years. Now, I find the land warrants issuing for these persons, who have left no legal representatives, widows, or such heirs as are provided for by the law. I desire, and I think it is but right, if it is the sense of the House, that the heirs and legal representatives of that class of persons—many of whom were young—should be entitled to these certificates, after the original applicants have been to the trouble of making their declarations and filing their proof.

Here is a young man who has died, leaving neither a wife nor children; but the certificate has issued. Now, in such a case as that I wish provision to be made, that the certificate shall go to the collateral heirs or legal representatives, and the claim be allowed, without requiring a new application and new proof.

Mr. FOWLER. I am opposed to this and to all amendments, and I am entirely sick of this talk. Let us have the question.

The question was then taken on Mr. FULLER's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I have been here too long not to know that a speech at this time would not be acceptable from anybody. I offer the amendment which I send to the Chair, and ask that a vote may be taken upon it. We have now got clear of the registers and receivers, and this amendment is intended for the benefit of a very meritorious class of our citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer it as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. COBB. We have voted down the amendment, have we not?

The CHAIRMAN. No vote has yet been taken on the amendment.

Mr. COBB. Then I offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the militia or volunteers or State troops of any State or Territory were called into military service, and whose services have been paid by the United States subsequent to the eighteenth of June, eighteen hundred and twelve, the officers, soldiers, and teamsters of such militia, volunteers, or troops, shall be entitled to all the benefits of the act entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and fifty: Provided, That the first proviso of the fourth section of the act of twenty-eighth of September, eighteen hundred and fifty, granting bounty land, &c., (which excluded members of Congress from the benefits thereof), be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. COBB. I want merely to remark, that, my amendment also proposes to repeal the proviso of the act of September 28th, 1850, which excluded members of Congress from the benefit of the act. Fortunately, I am not a soldier, so that this provision will not apply to me.

Mr. CARTTER. Unfortunately, you mean.

Mr. COBB. No, sir; fortunately now, as I have offered the amendment. The bill of 1850 excluded members of Congress from the benefits of that act, and the proviso to this amendment places them upon the same footing as other soldiers who did not happen to be members of Congress.

The first part of the amendment provides for a class of men whom it was intended to provide for by the act of September 28th, 1850, but by a forced construction of the Secretary of the Interior, they have been excluded from the benefits of that act. I have deemed it my duty towards these individuals to endeavor to get this amendment passed; but if the House thinks it ought not to pass, why let it go.

Mr. FOWLER. I object to this amendment, and call for the question.

Mr. COBB. One word more.

[Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. COBB. I have not exhausted my five minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. COBB. I care nothing about it—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The question was then taken on Mr. COBB's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. BARRERE's amendment, it was put and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That any sale or assignment of such warrant heretofore made for a valuable consideration, shall be deemed valid as though such warrant had been assignable at the time of sale or assignment.

I shall make no speech, being satisfied that if the amendment does not recommend itself to the House, nothing I can say will secure its passage.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. VENABLE moved that the committee rise, and report the bill as amended to the House; which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order of the House, being Senate bill 146, entitled "An act to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, and with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill do pass.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand that my colleague moves the previous question on the bill and on the amendments.

The SPEAKER. It covers both.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER stated the first question to be on concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to add at the end of the first section of the bill the following:

Provided, That the warrants which have been, or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of said act or of this act, may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location, at the minimum price. Provided further, That when said warrants shall be located upon lands which are subject to entry at a greater minimum than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the locators of said warrants shall pay to the United States, in cash, the difference between the value of such warrants at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and the tract of land located on.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALL. When that amendment was adopted in committee, there were sections to the bill authorizing the issue of warrants, but those sections were subsequently stricken out, and therefore I would suggest that the words "or of this act" be stricken out; they mean nothing.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITCH objected.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER stated the next question to be on concurring in the amendment of the committee to strike out all after the first section of the bill, comprising the following sections, viz:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the registers and receivers of the land offices, shall hereafter be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services in locating all military bounty land warrants, issued since the eleventh day of February, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, the same compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the said compensation to be hereafter paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants where they have been transferred under the provisions of any act of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office; and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the warrant was located by the soldier or warrantee, or his next of kin, as provided for by law.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That registers and receivers, whether in or out of office, at the passage of this act, or their legal representatives in case of death, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States, for services heretofore performed in locating military bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation provided in the preceding section for services hereafter to be performed, after deducting the amount already received by such officers under the act entitled "An act to require the holders of military land warrants to compensate the land officers of the United States for services in relation to the location of those warrants," approved May seveneenth, eighteen hundred and forty-eight: Provided, That no register or receiver shall receive any compensation out of the Treasury for past services, who has charged and received illegal fees for the location of such warrants: And provided further, That no register or receiver shall receive for his services during any year, a greater compensation than the maximum now allowed by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the militia or volunteers or State troops of any State or Territory were called into military service, and whose services have been paid by the United States subsequent to the eighteenth of June, eighteen hundred and twelve, the officers and soldiers of such militia, volunteers or troops, shall be entitled to all the benefits of the act entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and fifty, and shall receive lands for their services according to the provisions of said act, upon proof of length of service as therein required; and that the last proviso of the ninth section of the act of the eleventh of February, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, be, and the same is hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize bounty land to those who have heretofore received or become entitled to the same.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That where any company, battalion or regiment, in an organized form, marched more than twenty miles to the place where they were mustered into the service of the United States, or were discharged more than twenty miles from the place where such company, battalion, or regiment was organized:

in all such cases, in computing the length of service of the officers and soldiers of any such company, battalion, or regiment, with a view to determine the quantity of land any officer or soldier is entitled to under said act, approved twenty-eighth September, eighteen hundred and fifty, there shall be allowed one day for every twenty miles from the place where the company, battalion or regiment was organized, to the place where the same was mustered into the service of the United States; and also one day for every twenty miles from the place where such company, battalion, or regiment was discharged, to the place where it was organized, and from whence it marched to enter the service.

Passed the Senate, January 21, 1852.

Attest: ASBURY DICKINS, Secretary.

Mr. BISSELL demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. That amendment proposes to strike out several sections, and I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it is not competent for a separate vote to be taken upon striking out each section, if it shall be called for?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are some of the sections which I would vote with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to strike out, but there are other sections which I desire to retain.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is, that the uniform practice of the House has been against dividing a proposition of this kind. The whole having been reported as one amendment, the Chair thinks it is not competent to divide as the gentlemen proposes.

The question was then taken on concurring with the committee on striking out, and resulted—yeas 113, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, William Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Bartlett, Bennett, Bowie, Bowne, Bragg, Breckenridge, Briggs, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, Lewis D. So the House agreed to concur with the Committee of the Whole in the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay that motion on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS asked for the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been engrossed and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the Speaker that this is a Senate bill, and the question is, therefore, upon ordering the amendments to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time; and having been engrossed, the bill received its third reading.

The question now being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. SWEETSER demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Before the bill passes, I rise to a privileged question. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MASON. I desire to ask the Chair, if tomorrow is not private bill day?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MASON. I hope we shall at least have to-morrow for the consideration of private bills.

The question now being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. DANIEL demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

The question then recurred upon the passage of the bill as amended, and, being taken, it was carried in the affirmative.

So the bill passed in the following form, viz:

Be it enacted, &c., That all warrants for military bounty land, which have been or may hereafter be issued under any law of the United States, and all valid locations of the same, which have been, or may hereafter be made, are hereby declared to be assignable, by deed or instrument of writing, made and executed after the taking effect of this act, according to such form, and pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owners of the warrant or location: Provided, That any person entitled to preemption right to any land, shall be entitled to use any such land warrant in payment of the same, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, for the quantity of land therein specified: Provided, That the warrants which have been, or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of said act or of this act, may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location, at the minimum price: Provided further, That when said warrants shall be located upon lands which are subject to entry at a greater minimum than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the locators of said warrants shall pay to the United States, in cash, the difference between the value of such warrants at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and the tract of land located on.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote just taken, by which the bill passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Speaker's table is now loaded down with bills and other documents; and as the House has determined to adjourn over until Monday, it is very necessary that they should be taken up and disposed of. I know especially with regard to one Senate bill now upon that table in relation to which it is very important that it should be referred to the appropriate committee.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. STANLY. I have no objection to that. I desire, however, to make a motion for the printing of extra numbers of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It has always been done heretofore. The Committee of Ways and Means have hitherto had no opportunity to report a resolution for that purpose. I do not know what number has been usually printed. I move that the usual extra number of that document be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Under the rules of the House the motion to print extra copies of any document must be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STANLY. I am aware of that. I know that the motion must go to the Committee on Printing. I hope there will be no objection to its introduction.

There was no objection, and the motion was accordingly subnitted, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now renew my motion to take up the documents on the Speaker's table, and dispose of them.

There was no objection.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Executive communications:

I. A communication from the Treasury Department, accompanied by a report of the Superintendent of Marine Hospitals, of additional appropriations necessary to complete and sustain said hospitals; which, on motion of Mr. HOUSTON, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

II. A communication from the Treasury Department, covering a report upon the subject of light-houses, made by the board appointed in pursuance of the act of 8th March, 1851; which was, on the motion of Mr. CHANDLER, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

III. A communication from the War Department, transmitting, in pursuance of the act instituting a Military Asylum for the relief and support of sick and disabled soldiers, the report, by the President and Treasurers of the Board of Officers appointed in pursuance of said act, of the rules and regulations to govern said asylum. The report states that the board had selected, for the asylum at Washington, a tract of land owned by Mr. Riggs, distant two miles from Washington, for which they agreed to pay $57,000; and that the purchase had been approved by the President. On the motion of Mr. GORMAN, it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IV. A communication from the Post Office Department, pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress, approved July 3, 1836, entitled "An act to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and more effectually to provide for the settlement of the accounts therein," containing an abstract of the offers for carrying the mail during the year ending June 30, 1851; a report of the contracts for the transportation of the mails for the same year; and a report of the number and amount of fines imposed upon mail contractors during the same year, &c.; which, on motion by Mr. OLDS, was ordered to lie upon the table, and to be printed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following bills from the Senate; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

No. 78. An act amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," approved July 29, 1850. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No. — An act to change the time for holding the district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 7, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of citizens of Mount Morris, New York, remonstrating against an extension of C. H. McCormick's patent for a reaping machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SHIELDS presented documents in support of the claim of the widow of Brevet Major J. P. O'Brien, late of the United States Army, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of Rufus L. Baker, of the Ordnance Corps, praying to be allowed the difference of pay between the grades of captain and major, during the time he performed the duties of the latter grade; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of the Board of Supervisors of Columbia county, Wisconsin, praying that the military reserve at Fort Winnebago may be granted to the State for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the general consent of the Senate to take up the bill providing for the repair of the old Congressional Library.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to its consideration.

It provides that the sum of $72,500 be appropriated to repair the Congressional Library room, which was lately destroyed by fire, according to the plan described in the report and drawings which were submitted by the Architect to the Secretary of the Interior, and approved by the Committee on Public Buildings of the Senate; provided, however, that the work shall be executed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and be subject to such a modification of the details as may be consistent with the general arrangement of the plan, and necessary and proper in the opinion of the President of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say a very few words in regard to the bill. It provides only for the repair of the old Library room, which we hope to have fitted up and ready for use by the middle of May. It is an object which is very anxiously desired by members of both Houses of Congress, that we should have it fitted up as soon as possible. The room will be according to its old dimensions. I hold in my hand a drawing of a vertical section of it. As it is proposed, it is to consist of three stories and an alcove, surmounted above by light iron galleries, the whole to be crowned by a skylight the entire length of it. It is proposed to make it fire-proof, and that the only material used shall be iron. I believe that is a general description of the room. If Senators are anxious to look further into it, they will find a complete description in the report of the Architect, which was submitted to the Committee on Public Buildings.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILL PASSED.

The bill for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell, of Missouri, was read a third time and passed.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I desire to submit the following resolution, and if there is no objection ask for its consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to inform the Senate whether all the claims, which were exhibited to the late "Board of Commissioners on claims against Mexico," were finally adjudicated; and also whether the sum designated in the treaty was adequate to the full payment of the sums found due.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I will, in a very few words, state the reasons why I have submitted the resolution, and why, in my judgment, it should be adopted. It is stated that there is a balance of forty-odd thousand dollars remaining in the Treasury, after paying all the claims which have been found to be due by this Board. This balance, alleged to be now in the Treasury, is claimed by the Mexican Government, or rather has been assigned to a Mexican citizen, who has presented to the Senate a claim for it. The whole amount appropriated to meet the claims was three millions and a quarter. The Board of Commissioners adjudged all the claims, as is alleged, and now it is stated that there is a balance of forty-odd thousand dollars remaining in the Treasury.

The Committee of Claims desire to know—and it is also important for the Senate to know—whether all the claims presented against Mexico, on the part of this Government or of its citizens, have been finally adjudicated and passed upon by the Board; and we can only obtain that information from the Secretary of State. I hope, therefore, the resolution will be adopted.

The resolution was adopted.

SALT SPRINGS IN IOWA.

On the motion of Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to relinquish to the State of Iowa the lands reserved for salt springs therein; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

RELIEF OF SOLDIERS' WIDOWS.

On the motion of Mr. BORLAND, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to revive a portion of an act for the relief of the widows of deceased soldiers; and on his motion it was further postponed until Monday next.

CONTRACTS FOR MAILS.

Mr. CLEMENS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy and Postmaster General be requested to furnish Congress with copies of all contracts originally made and at present existing for the transportation of the mails between New York and California by steamships on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and all information they possess in regard thereto; what amount has been paid, and to whom; what amount is now paid, and to whom; for the transit of the mails across the Isthmus of Panama, in connection with said steamship service; the gross amount of money that has been paid under each service; when such contracts commenced; in what sums and at what periods of time paid, and to whom each payment has been made; whether at such periods as expressed under the terms of said contracts or otherwise; the amount of service rendered, and by what vessels; how often they arrive and depart; what time has been and is now occupied in the carriage of the mails between said ports; whether all the vessels stipulated under said contracts to be built have been so built, or what portion of them; whether, if two or three of the five ships contracted to be built under said contracts were not so built, but other vessels engaged in independent lines united with the vessels of the Government contractors, thus forming one line; each of the parties, however, owning their own vessels, and in that manner answering the terms of the contracts to build said five ships? Whether other facilities exist for performing the same or a similar service, and if other propositions have been made, and upon what terms, to perform said service, and within what periods of time?

THE EXILED IRISH PATRIOTS.

At one o'clock the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, viz: the resolution submitted by Mr. Foote, of Mississippi, on the 2d of December last, in these words:

Joint Resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien and Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in consideration of the general sympathy felt by the people of the United States for Smith O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, and their immediate associates, exiled Irish patriots, and the warm sympathies felt by the countrymen of these distinguished sufferers, who have become adopted citizens of the United States, the President of the United States be requested to authorize a correspondence to be opened with the Government of her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, appealing to the magnanimity of the British Government and people in their behalf, and respectfully requesting the liberation of these personages from their present confinement, with an offer to receive them upon the hospitable shores of the United States.

On Thursday, the 29th of January, Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following amendment; which is the pending question:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

"That while we disclaim all intention of interfering in any way in the internal affairs of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, we deem it our duty to express, in a respectful manner, our firm conviction that it would be highly gratifying to the people of the United States, many of whom are natives of Ireland, and connected by blood with the inhabitants of that country, to see Smith O'Brien and his associates restored to liberty, and permitted, if so disposed, to emigrate to this country. We would regard this act of clemency as a new proof of the friendly disposition of the British Government towards our Republic, and as calculated to strengthen the bonds of affection now happily existing between the people of the United States and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Senate at some length in support of his proposition. A report of his speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to suggest to the consideration of the honorable Senator from Illinois, who has favored us with a very eloquent, and I hope very influential argument, in favor of the passage of this resolution, some amendments to his amendment, which, if he will give me his attention, I will read. They are to strike out, in the fourth line of the printed amendment the word "respectful," and insert the word "courteous;" in the same line, strike out the word "conviction," and insert the word "opinion;" in the ninth and tenth lines, strike out the words "we would regard this act of clemency," and insert "this act of clemency would be regarded;" so as to make the amendment read:

"That while we disclaim all intention of interfering in any way in the internal affairs of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, we deem it our duty to express, in a courteous manner, our firm opinion that it would be highly gratifying to the people of the United States, many of whom are natives of Ireland, and connected by blood with the inhabitants of that country, to see Smith O'Brien and his associates restored to liberty, and permitted, if so disposed, to emigrate to this country. And that this act of clemency would be regarded as a new proof of the friendly disposition of the British Government towards our Republic, and as calculated to strengthen the bonds of affection now happily existing between the people of the United States and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

I have a few words to say upon these amendments, and also upon the resolution itself. I will be governed by the preference of the Senate, as to whether I shall proceed now or at a future time.

Several Senators expressed a desire to adjourn.

Mr. SEWARD. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 9, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, a report from the Chief Engineer, that a communication from the Board of Engineer officers for the Pacific coast, addressed to the Engineer Department on the 28th of October last, recommended that Congress be asked to appropriate not less than $500,000 for the commencement of fortifications at San Francisco; which was read, and ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of December 13, 1815, sixty-two copies of the official Army Register for the year 1852, for the use of the Senate; which was read, and ordered to be laid on the table.

Also, a resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of an appropriation of the vacant public lands within the Vincennes land district for the benefit of common schools; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of the location of a national armory at Evansville, in that State; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of the construction of a canal around the Falls of the Ohio river; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD. I am requested to present the petition of Richard M. Bouton, of the State of New York. He says that in the year 1842, he was employed by the Commissary of Ordnance to manufacture percussion caps for the use of the Army; that from that time until the present he has diligently devoted himself to that task; that he found there was not either in this country or in Europe any efficient machine, which was self-operating, for that purpose; that he has invented and perfected such a machine; that the articles which are the production of it are now in use in the Army and Navy of the United States; that they are made with greater economy than, and are of vastly superior quality to, any other; and that it is the interest of the Government of the United States to secure to itself a property in the invention. He presents an application to the Senate to take the subject into their consideration. It is supported by letters from Colonel Baker, a late Secretary of War, Mr. Marcy, the Chief Engineer of the Navy Yard; and others. In compliance with his request, I move that the memorial and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. They were so referred.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the petition of a body of Hungarian refugees, settled in Scott county, Iowa, praying that they may be included in any measure of relief which Congress may pass for the benefit of their brethren at New Buda, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GWIN. I present the memorial of James M. Crane, praying additional compensation for publishing the acts of Congress for 1849-'50, in the California Courier, a newspaper published by him in California, and that some general provision may be made for giving adequate compensation to the newspaper press in that State for publishing the laws of the United States. I will state, in presenting this petition, that the present compensation for publishing the laws there is entirely inadequate. During the last summer, I was applied to on numerous occasions for copies of the laws. They never can be published there unless there is an additional compensation. As the question is important, in connection with the Judiciary system, I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was so referred.

Mr. GWIN also presented the petition of Samuel Stone and Isaac H. Marks, praying compensation for property of which they were dispossessed under an Indian treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ENGROSSED BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

A bill to relinquish to the State of Iowa the lands reserved for salt springs therein; and

A bill to provide for the repair of the Congressional Library room, lately destroyed by fire.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, was received:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed the bill to make land warrants assignable, with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

CASH & ELLIS.

Mr. DAWSON. A bill for the relief of David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis, was rejected by the Senate on Friday last. At the request of some of the friends of that bill, I move to reconsider the vote by which it was rejected.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The PRESIDENT. The first general order is a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in that State. This bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question pending is on an amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELT] had the floor when that bill was last under discussion. He is not now in his seat, and I would like to make some arrangement, if possible, that it might come up in its order when that Senator may be present. I hope, therefore, that at this time it will be passed over informally.

THE PRESIDENT. It will be one o'clock very shortly, when the special order will be called for, and some disposition must be made of this bill.

MR. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the consent of the Senate to pass that bill over, as the Senator from Tennessee is not in his place.

MR. DODGE, of Iowa. I make no objection to the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, because the Senator from Tennessee is entitled to the floor, and is understood to be desirous of addressing the Senate.

The bill was then passed over informally.

NAVY-YARD IN SAN FRANCISCO.

THE PRESIDENT. The next general order is a bill to establish a navy-yard and depôt on the Bay of San Francisco, in California.

MR. GWIN. I should like to make a statement with regard to that bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] wishes to be present when that bill is called up. Pressing business in the State of Pennsylvania has called him away for a short time, and before his departure I agreed not to call up this bill until Thursday next. I am willing that it should be passed over until that day, but I now give notice that I will then call it up.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

LIFE-SECURITY ON STEAMBOATS.

The bill supplementary to the several acts of Congress, providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes, next came up in its order, as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill consists of two sections, the first of which provides that the authority vested in the judges of the district courts of the United States, within whose judicial districts ports of entry or delivery may be established on the navigable waters, lakes, bays, and rivers of the United States, by the act of July 7th, 1838, entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers," &c., be vested in the judge of any other district court of the United States, within whose judicial district no ports of entry or delivery may have been established by law, and that he be authorized to appoint one or more persons competent to make inspections of such boats, and of their boilers and machinery; that such persons so appointed shall not be interested in the manufacture of steam-engines, boilers, or other machinery belonging to steam vessels, who shall perform the duties contemplated by said law, and receive such compensation as said law prescribes. The second section provides that all certificates of inspection, required by said act, shall be delivered to the clerk of the district court of the United States for the judicial district in which said certificate shall have been issued; and that any master or owner of any steamboat who shall refuse to deliver such certificate within thirty days after such vessel shall have become employed in any judicial district as aforesaid, shall incur a penalty of one hundred dollars, to be recovered and distributed like other penalties incurred under existing laws.

MR. BORLAND. If there is nothing at present before the Senate, I should be glad to have that bill disposed of now. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has an amendment to offer to the bill, to which I presume there will be no objection; and I hope the bill will then be allowed to pass.

MR. UNDERWOOD. I have prepared an amendment, which I will read to the Senate. I propose that it shall come in at the end of the bill by way of an additional section. The amendment is as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the judges of the district courts of the United States within whose judicial districts there may be ports of entry or delivery, shall have power and authority to appoint inspectors of steamboats, and of their boilers and machinery, at such places within the judicial district not less than fifty miles distant from a port of entry or delivery, as the judge of the district may deem proper; and the inspectors so appointed shall have all the powers and rights, and shall perform all the duties and be subject to all the liabilities imposed upon inspectors appointed under and in virtue of the act of 7th July, 1838, entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," and the act to modify said act, approved March 3, 1843, and any other act of Congress: Provided, That no person shall be appointed an inspector as aforesaid who is interested in the manufacture of steam-engines, steam-boilers, or other machinery belonging to steam vessels.

I approve entirely of the object of the bill of my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND;] and from what I know of the rivers in his State, not having ports of entry, there is great injury sustained for want of inspectors. I know also that the people in the western end of my State, who are removed some two or three hundred miles from Louisville, (the nearest port of entry for them,) labor under the same difficulties, there being no inspectors of steamboats at Paducah and other places. My amendment, therefore, provides that judges of the district courts, where there are such ports of entry or delivery, may appoint inspectors—men who, in the language of the bill, "shall not be interested in the manufacture of steam-engines, steam-boilers, or other machinery belonging to steam vessels," who shall make the inspection and perform the duties contemplated by the said law, "and who shall be subject to all the responsibilities imposed by any act of Congress." I have conferred with my friend from Arkansas, and I believe that he is willing that the benefits proposed by his bill to be conferred on the State of Arkansas should be extended to the State of Kentucky by the amendment which I have offered. I see no objection that can be offered to the passage of the bill. I hope that the amendment will be adopted, and that the bill will be passed.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

No other amendment being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

MR. DOWNS. When that bill was before the Senate at a former session, I stated some reasons why I thought it ought not to be passed; and I must confess that the same reasons still operate upon my mind. I know it is very desirable to have a proper inspection of steamboat boilers, and Congress has designated by law the places where certificates of inspection may be given and by whom. But the law, as it is, has operated badly, and there has been a great deal of complaint that the certificates of inspection have been given in many instances without sufficient examination. It seems to me that it will be a better security that the certificates of inspection are properly given, to require that the boats shall be inspected at the great points where inspections are now made—at the ports of entry, like Louisville or New Orleans. But if you extend the facilities for procuring certificates of inspection, so that they may be procured on all the small rivers in every State, it may happen that when a certificate is refused at one point, the boat may be taken to another of the small places, and the consequence will be that the inspection will be less rigid, and that certificates will be granted with less examination than at present. Besides, I see no necessity for this bill as a matter of convenience, because though the boats may run on the small rivers, they are generally built or repaired at other ports—at Louisville or New Orleans—and they can obtain their certificates there. I think, therefore, as there seems to be no necessity for the passage of this bill, and especially as I think the very small security we now have will be weakened by it, that it should not be passed.

MR. BORLAND. I did not anticipate there would be any opposition whatever to the passage of this bill. I think the Senator from Louisiana is entirely mistaken in the purpose of the bill. It is not to weaken or to lessen the security we now have; it is not to change the law at all on the subject of inspection; it requires the same qualifications on the part of inspectors which are now required. It refers to the general law, and simply extends the benefits of that general law over a region of the country that does not now enjoy those benefits. The general law, as the Senator very well knows, gives power to district judges of the United States to appoint inspectors within collection districts. Where the district of the judge is a collection district of the United States, there he has the power to appoint inspectors, but judges whose districts do not embrace a collection district have no power to make these appointments. This bill simply proposes to confer on the judge of the district of Arkansas the same power which judges have where there are collection districts. That is the chief provision of the bill, as it was reported by the Committee on Commerce, and the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky only extends the power of the district judge of Kentucky a little further than it now exists, and enables him to appoint inspectors at other ports which are not ports of entry, provided these places are not within a certain distance of some port of entry.

The honorable Senator from Louisiana says that he sees no necessity for the passage of this bill, because these inspections may be made at other important points. But they are distant points, and therein is the difficulty. They are points so distant as to subject those interested in the boats which navigate the rivers of Arkansas to very great inconvenience and very great expense. A boat which has been injured on the White river, or the Arkansas, or any other river in that State, must be taken to a distant port to be repaired, for the reason that her inspection must be made and certificate given at that port. But if you give us the advantage of having our boats inspected at home, where the accident has occurred, we shall then have the facilities for repairing our boats at home also. Even our steam ferry-boats are under the necessity of being taken fifteen hundred or two thousand miles to get their inspection certificates. That is a very serious objection to the present law, as it affects States situated as mine is. The Senator says he is not aware that very serious inconvenience or suffering exists. I can say to him, that if he had lived in my State, he would know that serious injury has resulted from the present regulations. The consequence of the inconvenience of getting certificates is, that our rivers are filled with boats which could not get a certificate anywhere. They have come from other rivers, and slip into ours where there is no place of inspection, and thus they evade the general law. We wish to compel them to be inspected where their trade is, so that thus they cannot impose upon our people, and expose the lives of passengers. That is the object of this bill. It does not propose to change the present law at all, but only to give us the same benefits that the people of the rest of the United States enjoy.

MR. UNDERWOOD. I wish to address a single remark to the Senator from Louisiana, to show that there are actually existing difficulties which should be remedied. There is a very large steamboat manufactory carried on at Paducah. There are also preparations made for repairing boats to a very great extent. Now, suppose a new boat is built at Paducah; that boat must be taken to Louisville, some three hundred miles from Paducah, up the river, to be inspected; and that boat may be designed to trade upon the Tennessee river, and for no other trade. You will then compel the boat to travel three hundred miles up and down the river, putting the owners to the expense of these two trips, for no other purpose than to procure a certificate of inspection.

Take another case: Suppose the Arkansas river becomes low, as it does occasionally, and see how these small boats are affected that run upon it, trading from Little Rock to the Mississippi river, and not passing below the junction with the Mississippi, but from point to point along the Arkansas. The law, as it now exists, requires boats to be inspected every six months. When the six months expire after the boat has been once inspected, that Arkansas boat has to travel to New Orleans, or to St. Louis, to procure another certificate of inspection. You see at once what a cost and delay is put upon the owner of the boat, and to a certain extent, upon all that are concerned in the management of it, for the purpose of inspection.

Now my friend's bill, with my amendment, is designed to provide for having inspectors at the places where the boats are repaired, and near the places where they trade, so that after the time expires within which they are required to be inspected, they need not travel out of their way for that purpose, but may have an inspector near at hand. It seems to me that inspectors in Arkansas, having the duty of inspecting the boats in which the property and lives of the citizens of that State are intrusted, will perhaps be a little more diligent and faithful in their attention to the boats engaged exclusively in the Arkansas trade, than those would who have the duty of inspecting boats which are to be engaged in trade four or five hundred miles distant. They would then have an additional incentive, perhaps, to a diligent and faithful execution of the trust, when the lives and property of the people of their own State were concerned, and I should, therefore, expect them to perform the duty faithfully. These are the evils which exist, and which the bill proposes to remedy, and I hope that it may be permitted to pass.

My friend from Massachusetts, on my left, [Mr. DAVIS,] has a bill, which he promises to bring forward soon, overhauling the whole subject, endeavoring to make provisions which will regulate the whole matter, from beginning to end. If I am correctly informed, it proposes something like a revision of the present law. We in the West all have a common interest, not only on the Mississippi, but on all its tributaries; and I have no doubt we are all sincerely anxious to see that system adopted which will secure the lives and property of our people. It seems to me that this bill will not interfere with the one which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposes to present; and when that bill comes up, if it will secure the object we aim at, I shall be ready to sustain it, and to unite with my friends from the West to accomplish so desirable an object.

Mr. DOWNS. I am willing to go as far as any one to facilitate the interest of the West, and especially that of the States of Arkansas and Kentucky, and it is with very great regret that I offer any opposition to this bill, and I do it only from a sense of duty. I admit, that there are some inconveniences resulting from the law as it now exists, though they do not seem to me to be quite so great as have been pointed out. There is no necessity that a boat shall be inspected wherever she goes. She gets her inspection at some place where there is an inspector. Is there any boat now running in the district in which either of the members is particularly interested, which does not in her usual voyages go to Memphis or Nashville, or St. Louis, or some port which is a port of entry?

Mr. BORLAND. There are half a dozen, at least, in my State.

Mr. DOWNS. I think they must be very rare cases, in which a boat does not run to some port of entry.

Mr. BORLAND. There are many on the White and Arkansas rivers. They run in the interior of the State.

Mr. DOWNS. I do not think the evil is so very great as has been stated. I opposed this bill heretofore, and I oppose it still, because it must be recollected that if there is some inconvenience, and some evil at present, there are, in my opinion, evils on the other hand transcendently greater. The loss of life is an immense evil, and it has been so great on the rivers at the West, that many persons so distrust the boats that they actually avoid them, after all that has been done to prevent explosions, or to guard against them. I happen to have stronger convictions on this subject, from the fact, that at one time of my life it was my duty, as a district attorney, to investigate several cases of calamitous explosions, and to go into the details of an examination as to the manner in which these certificates were granted; and from the several investigations I was engaged in there, I came to the conclusion that the system was exceedingly defective; that these certificates of inspection were scarcely anything but a mere matter of form, and that little dependence could be placed upon them. I oppose this bill, because I think that if you increase the number of inspectors, and appoint them in small places away from these important points where the public attention would be called to them, and where the public can know something of the qualifications of the inspectors, and extend the power of appointment to so many other places, so that it becomes almost a general thing, you will weaken the security which we now have. We may have confidence in a certificate given at Louisville or New Orleans, where there are experienced and able engineers; for in such places they generally appoint men whose names are known, and whose certificates will give confidence. Although they may have as competent persons in Arkansas, or at other places than Louisville, Kentucky, yet their names are not so well known to the public. So far from extending this power of appointing inspectors, I think it should be restricted. I believe that whenever any remedy is devised for application upon our western waters, it will be that of a restriction, rather than an enlargement of this system, and to provide some other mode of examining these boats, and the quality of their engines, so that it may be ascertained with some degree of certainty whether it is safe for people to travel upon them or not.

I know that there are suggestions of that kind. I know that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] proposes something of that kind. But now, imperfect as this system is—and I must say that I have no particular interest in this matter more than other Senators, no interests beyond those feelings of humanity which prompt us all—I should see with reluctance a system which I think will operate injuriously, so greatly extended as is proposed by this bill, and especially as the Senator from Kentucky informs us that a new system is very shortly to be reported. Why, then, take up this subject in which all are so deeply interested, when a bill matured under all the light which science can shed upon it is so soon to be brought forward? I hope that gentlemen will consent to let the matter stand as it is until the bill is brought before us which has been promised by the Senator from Massachusetts. I will go as far as any man on this floor in doing everything that I believe likely to promote the interests of every section of the country, and to afford all facilities necessary for the easy transaction of their business; but at the same time I desire to take every requisite precaution in guarding the lives of the community who are obliged to travel upon these boats. I am as much interested in this matter as any other gentleman. I live in the interior of the State of Louisiana, and boats in the interior of that State have the same interest in regard to this question as those in the States of Kentucky and Arkansas. I shall, therefore, do everything to facilitate their trade; but I must oppose this bill because the impression is strong upon my mind that it would increase the danger of those explosions which have already been so tremendous and appalling.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. CASS. I was about to suggest that a vote should be taken on this question immediately, in order that the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] who has the floor on another subject which was made the special order for this day, should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish only one moment. I have been asked to state to the Senate what is the condition of this bill which has been referred to by the honorable Senator from Louisiana. It has been delayed much beyond what I could wish; but every Senator will perceive that it is a subject which is so complicated that a great deal of information is necessary in order to frame a bill. That information has come in, some of it more slowly than I could wish; but I will say to the honorable Senator that I expect in the course of this week to present the bill to the Senate, and in that bill there will be a provision for the consideration of the Senate—in the first place for inspecting the iron of which boilers are made; and in the next place for a rigid inspection of boilers, with the application of a test to show their strength. The whole subject, in a word, will be brought under the consideration of the Senate, with the design of giving the most ample protection to life and property which it is in the power of Congress to afford.

There being no further proposition to amend, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was decided in the affirmative.

NON-INTERVENTION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by Mr. CLARKE, on the 19th ultimo, on the subject of non-intervention, [see page 298,] and the pending amendments proposed by Mr. SEWARD and Mr. CASS, [see page 310.]

The resolutions and the amendments having been read, Mr. CLARKE addressed the Senate at length in favor of the views embodied in the resolutions.

Mr. CASS was next recognized by the Chair; but, on the motion of Mr. HAMLIN, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

On motion, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 9, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

Mr. MILLSON. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the House on Friday last referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions the bill for the relief of William Miller, intending afterwards to move its reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I have examined the bill and report, and find that its legitimate reference is to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I made the motion on last Friday. I did not then understand the case; nor was there found any one upon the floor who did. It was necessary that it should be disposed of, that the House might reach other matters. Hence I made the motion. I believe the gentleman is right; and hope that his motion may prevail.

The question was taken, and the vote was reconsidered; and then, on further motion, the bill was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY AND BENJ. E. GREEN.

Mr. GREY occupied the floor for an hour, under a suspension of the rules, in reply to the remarks of Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, a few days since, on the Mexican indemnity bill, which injuriously connected the name of Mr. B. E. Green with the non-payment by Mexico of the indemnity due by her in 1844. His remarks, vindicating the conduct of Mr. Green against the alleged charges of Mr. BAYLY, have been withheld for revision. They will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. MURPHY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims have leave to report back to the House the petition and papers of Doctor Avery Downer, praying for a pension; and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the House.

I will only remark as to this petition praying for a pension, that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims consider it was improperly referred to that committee, and therefore ask leave to report it back. There has been once a favorable report by the House upon this petition, and the petitioner desires to withdraw his petition that he may present it to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

CHAIRMAN OF MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. ORR. I rise for the purpose of asking the House to excuse my colleague [Mr. BURT] from further service upon the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. Burt left this city about the middle of December. Upon his return home, he was seized with indisposition, which has continued up to the present time; and the probability is that the time of his return may be delayed much longer. It may perhaps relieve the Committee on Military Affairs from much embarrassment by excusing him from further service, so that another gentleman may occupy that post, and thus enable the committee to proceed in the discharge of the duties devolving upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to know whether such is the wish of the gentleman's colleague?

Mr. ORR. Of course. I should not have made the application, had it not been the desire of my colleague.

No objection being made, Mr. BURT was excused from service; and Mr. FAULKNER, of Virginia, was appointed to fill the vacancy.

MAIL STEAMSHIPS AND MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. PEASLEE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the resolution which I send to the Speaker's table.

The resolution was then read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House the facts in relation to the respective contracts with the Navy Department for building mail steamships for the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, between New York and New Orleans, Havana and Chagres, and between Panama and San Francisco, and some point in Oregon: the amount of money which has been advanced and paid each of said lines of steamships by the Government; also, whether the vessels stipulated under said contracts to be built, have been so built, or what portion of them; also, the amount of net receipts of postage collected on either of said lines of steamers, deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriations for the annual compensation for the service rendered under their contracts, or which has been applied in payment of said annual compensation, pursuant to section 10, of the acts of Congress of August 3, 1848. And whether said steamships or any other steamships employed in the transportation of our foreign mails are in all respects suitable for immediate conversion into steamers for war purposes, capable of carrying the ammunition or battery appropriate to the class specified in the contracts; and if not suitable for such immediate conversion, whether they could be altered so as to make them efficient war steamers; and if so, what alterations would be necessary to be made, and at what expense to make them war steamers of the first class.

Mr. GORMAN. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. PEASLEE. I move that the rules of the House be suspended to enable me to introduce it.

Mr. SMART demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. PEASLEE demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. SMART and WILLIAMS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 33; no quorum.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will ask a recount—there is a quorum in the House.

There being no objection, the question was again taken, and decided in the affirmative, the tellers having reported—ayes 95, noes 27; and the rules were accordingly suspended.

Mr. PEASLEE. I move that the rules be suspended that the resolution may be considered to-day, that motion being necessary, as this is a call for information, which the rule requires shall lie over one day.

The SPEAKER. The practice adopted by the Chair has been, in such cases, to take the vote after the rules were suspended, upon the adoption of any resolution calling for information; and for its adoption the Chair has required a two-thirds vote; otherwise he would feel it his duty to declare the resolution disagreed to under the rule requiring the resolution to lay over one day.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to suspend the rule which requires the resolution to lie over one day, as the House having suspended the rules for its introduction, I apprehend there will be no objection to its being now considered.

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended.

Mr. JONES. I move to strike out the word "requested," and in its stead to insert the word "directed." That is the language of the rule.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PEASLEE] would inform the House as to his object in making this call. When these calls are made upon the Department it requires a great deal of time, labor, and extra clerk hire, and I want to know, before we make this call imposing additional duty, its object.

Mr. PEASLEE. It seemed to me, from the large amount of money we have already expended in connection with these steamers, the applications we had at the last Congress, which we have already had at this, and which we may have hereafter, that the subject was of consequence enough for the House to obtain all the light and information possible, from the most responsible and reliable sources, to enable them to act understandingly. If I understand right, we are annually appropriating $1,300,000 for the support of our ocean mail steamer service. Applications have already been made from these lines for additional compensation. The amount of money which we shall be compelled to pay under the present contract, if the contractors perform their service according to their requirements without giving additional compensation, or the establishment of any new lines, will be about ten millions of dollars—before their expiration—during the seven or eight years which they have to run. There were applications at the last session of Congress, and I doubt not that there have been already, and will be for a much larger number this, for the establishment of thirteen additional mail steamers for our foreign mail service, involving an outlay, in the first instance, to assist in building the ships, of six and a half millions of dollars, and an expenditure of two millions of dollars annually afterwards. This is in addition to those already established, and without any additional compensation. If the contracts had been entered into according to the propositions made at the last session of Congress, strenuously urged and enforced upon the House, and which, I have no doubt, will be at this, for the time and price specified, it would have involved an expenditure by this Government to the amount of about forty millions of dollars, as I understand it. Well, sir, one of the principal arguments I have understood in favor of these steam lines—both those for whom we have already appropriated money and for which we will be asked hereafter—was, that they were to be built after the most substantial approved model of war-steamers; that they are capable of immediate conversion into war-steamers of the first class; that they are always ready, with but little expense of time and money, for cases of emergency, and that it would be the most economical means the Government could resort to for the purpose of keeping up our Navy. It is said, upon the other hand, by some gentlemen, that these steamers, or a larger portion of them, are not capable of being converted into war-steamers of the first class—that they cannot be converted even into inefficient steamers for our purposes without great expense of time and money, and that they are incapable of carrying, or of being made capable of carrying, the armament and batteries, and that, being constructed principally with a view to speed and the carriage of passengers, they cannot, at any rate, be made war-steamers of the first class, and would, in fact, be of little or no use to the Government. How these facts may be, I do not undertake to say; but I wish to have the information from a responsible and reliable source, that I, and the rest of the House, may be able to act more understandingly upon this subject. I am unwilling, with all the information I have been enabled to obtain, to vote to bind this Government in contracts with individuals which may involve the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars to extend a system, to say the least of it, of doubtful expediency, when our commerce has grown up to be second to no nation in the world, without any such aid. It has a monopolizing and partial tendency, and I am unwilling to vote millions and millions of dollars for such a system, unless I am confident that it is one which will inure to the benefit of the Government; that these steamers are in fact what they are represented to be—of being capable of conversion immediately into war-steamers of the first class.

Mr. OLDS. I should like to inquire of the gentleman, if his resolution calls for copies of the contracts?

Mr. PEASLEE. It calls for the facts in relation to the contracts, but not copies of the contracts.

Mr. OLDS. It is important that we should have them; and I hope the gentleman will embrace them in his call.

Mr. PEASLEE. I have no objection to an amendment of that kind. I will not detain the House longer. My only object is to obtain light and information upon the subject, which it seems to me to be of the deepest importance to the Treasury and country, and which can do no harm, and which may enable us to act more understandingly upon this subject, and be of much benefit.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am in favor of the resolution, for the reasons assigned by the gentleman, and concur most heartily with his views, if I heard him correctly, in regard to these steamships.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. PEASLEE. I have no objection to the modification, if it is in order to accept it. I also accept the modification of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS.]

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution; and it was agreed to.

THE TARIFF OF 1846.

Mr. WELCH asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are instructed to report a bill modifying and altering the tariff of 1846, by substituting, wherever practicable, specific for ad valorem duties, with such rates of duty as will yield sufficient revenue; and with such discriminations in favor of iron and other articles of domestic manufacture and productions, as will afford adequate protection to the labor of our own citizens against foreign competition.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia, objected.

Mr. WELCH moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce the resolution.

Mr. BOCKOCK demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 60, nays 108, as follows, viz:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Barrere, Bell, Bennett, Bibbighaus, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, George H. Brown, E. C. Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Conger, Curtis, Doty, Duncan, Evans, Fowle, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Harper, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Geo. G. King, Mann, Martin, Meacham, Miller, Miner, Newton, Samuel W. Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Porter, Price, Schoolcraft, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Stratton, Strother, Taylor, Thurston, Washburn, Watkins, Welsh, Wells, and Addison White—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Andrews, Averett, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bocoock, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Jos. Cable, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Cartter, Caske, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Eastman, Edmundson, Ewing, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Floyd, Freeman, Gamble, Glendon, Gosman, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Isam G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Ives, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Geo. W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, McCorkle, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Milson, Molony, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Peaslee, Penn, Polk, Powell, Rantoul, Riddle, Robie, Robinson, Savage, Scurry, Smart, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abram P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, Ward, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, Williams, and Woodward—108.

Mr. INGERSOLL, who was without the bar when his name was called, asked the unanimous consent to record his vote in the negative. Objection was made, and the permission not granted.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CLARK. I rise to what I understand to be a point of order. I ask if this is not resolution day?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the day will be employed in that way.

The SPEAKER. It is also in order, the Chair will inform the gentleman, to move to suspend the rules, and to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce resolutions.

DISTRIBUTION OF ARMS.

Mr. HOWARD asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of distributing arms to the new States and Territories, as recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of War.

There being no objection, the question was taken, and the resolution was adopted.

WIDOW OF GENERAL BELKNAP.

Mr. HARPER asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the support of the widow of the late Brigadier General Belknap.

There being no objection, the question was then taken, and the resolution adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN asked the unanimous consent of the House to present the petition of John A. Poor and others, of the Executive Committee of the State of Maine, and members of the corporation of the European and North American Railroad, for aid to said work.

Mr. STANLEY objected.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move a suspension of the rules for the purpose.

Mr. STANLEY. Can it not be introduced under the rules?

Mr. WASHBURN. I can present it under the rules, but I choose to present it in this way; and inasmuch as it comes from the Executive of Maine, I desire to have it printed.

Mr. FICKLIN. Is it an act of the Legislature?

Mr. WASHBURN. It is a petition in behalf of the State of Maine.

Mr. FICKLIN. It is not customary to publish these petitions?

The question was then taken; and a count being had, there were—ayes 76, noes 46.

Mr. WASHBURN demanded tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I ask if this is not a memorial which may be presented under the rules? Some gentlemen say it is, and others it is not.

Mr. SMART. It may be presented, but cannot be printed under the rules.

Mr. CABELL. If it can be presented under the rules, I am opposed to it.

Mr. WASHBURN. It may be presented under the rules; but inasmuch as it is an elaborate petition, drawn up by the Executive Committee of the State of Maine with great care, I desire to have it printed.

The question was then taken, (Messrs. BROWN, of Mississippi, and FULLER, of Maine, acting as tellers,) and there were—ayes 73, noes 53.

GRANT'S CHANNEL THROUGH SHELL REEF.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inquire into and report to this House the advantages resulting to the commerce of the United States, and to the mail service of the United States, from the opening of a channel, by John Grant, Esq., through the Shell Reef, lying between Dauphin Island and Cedar Point, in Mobile county, Alabama; and further, what tonnage said Grant is now allowed by law to charge vessels navigating said channel, how long his right to charge said tonnage will continue, and whether it would be advantageous to the United States to purchase the right of said Grant; and, if so, at what cost the purchase may be effected.

Mr. CARTTER objected.

Mr. BROWN. I move a suspension of the rules, to enable me to introduce the resolution. It is but a resolution of inquiry into a matter of great importance to the commerce of the country, and I therefore hope the House will indulge me.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the resolution was introduced.

Mr. BROWN moved to suspend the rule requiring a resolution of inquiry to lay over one day; which motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was put, and the resolution was agreed to.

ARMY ON THE ROUTE TO OREGON.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House what steps, if any, have been taken to insure the protection of emigrants en route to Oregon, against the depredations of the Indians of that Territory; and in case no such steps have been taken for that purpose, that he be requested to cause the regiment of Mounted Rifles to be placed upon duty within the Territory of Oregon—the service for which said troops were created—and that he cause a portion of said regiment to be posted upon the main emigrant road from St. Joseph, on the Missouri, between Fort Hall and the Dalles of the Columbia river, and the remainder thereof to be posted in the Rogue river Valley, on the road from Oregon to California, said troops being necessary for the protection of emigrants and others traveling said road.

Mr. HAVEN. I rise to move a reconsideration of the vote by which that resolution was just now adopted. I do it for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact, that the resolution seems to give directions to the President of the United States with reference to the mode of employing the military forces of the United States. If this be so—and I am not sure that it is, for I did not hear the resolution distinctly—it seems to me that the resolution ought not to be passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the resolution be read. The Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. HAVEN. I have nothing to add to what I said before the resolution was read. Unless there is some explanation other than what appears on the face of the resolution, it does seem to me that it would be indiscreet on the part of the House to allow the vote to stand. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman from Oregon to allow the vote to be reconsidered, and instead of calling upon the President and giving him the directions therein specified, refer the subject to the Committee on Military Affairs, and let them inquire into what has been done and what it may be necessary to do, in order to protect the emigrants on that route. It would be a very strange mode of proceeding, it seems to me, for this House to direct the President how he shall dispose of the army, or any portion of it. And certainly, if what is there embodied is to be done at all, it should be done by joint resolution of Congress, and not by one House. I think it would be better to reconsider the vote and let the resolution go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LANE. I hold in my hand a number of petitions and memorials from the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, upon this subject, which I would ask to have read, but that it would consume too much of the time of the House. I will, however, give some reasons why the resolution ought to pass to-day. We have to furnish troops for the protection of this route within less than two months from to-day, or it cannot be done in time to protect the emigrants who will go out the ensuing season. By that time the people bound for Oregon will be on the road. Can we get the matter before the Committee on Military Affairs and have a bill passed through both Houses of Congress for raising and organizing a force, and get that force on the road in time for the protection to which these American citizens are entitled? It is only very recently—within the last few years—that the Indians have become very troublesome on these routes.

But that time has passed away. Lately the Indians have committed greater depredations than ever. Even within the last twelve months they have been successful in killing a great many women and children. The last Congress passed a law making donations and grants of lands to the settlers and emigrants to that country, and thereby inducing them to emigrate thither. And now I ask, is it not right and proper that they should afford them protection? The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] says this resolution ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs. He says, let them consider the matter and report a bill. Let me tell that gentleman that this regiment of troops was raised by order of Congress for that especial purpose. The rifle regiment was, if I mistake not, raised especially for the Oregon service. But it was raised in the time of the Mexican war; and, instead of sending them to Oregon, as was contemplated, they were sent to Mexico, where they did good service. When they returned from Mexico the President, in consideration of the fact that they had been diverted from the purpose for which they were raised, thought it right to extend to them the privilege of a discharge. They were discharged, but it was recruited again, and in recruiting it was held out as a special inducement, that they should be employed in the Oregon service. I think that was the understanding between the Government and those who were recruited. They were sent to Oregon, but before they had had time to render any service there they were ordered away. Now the service of that regiment belonged to Oregon, and to no other portion of the United States. I am aware that the President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of the Army; and I do not desire to infringe upon his privileges or his authority. I do not ask the House to do that. All I ask is, for the House to request him respectfully to grant to the people of Oregon just what is their due; and to the people who are traveling to Oregon, what they are entitled to, protection. Is it right, I ask, to have an extent of country two thousand miles in length, running through the Indian country, running through the lands of some of the most fierce and barbarous tribes of Indians upon the face of the earth, who will attack and cripple the cattle and teams, and then capture or kill the travelers themselves—I say, is it right to have this whole extent of country entirely without protection? The reasons are plain to my mind. No time should be lost. This matter ought at once to be settled—this resolution ought to be passed immediately, and let the President direct the rifle regiment which was raised especially for that service to march at once for Oregon.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question? Do I understand that this resolution requests or directs the President to make this disposition of that regiment?

Mr. LANE. It requests him.

Mr. CABELL. The resolution goes on to direct that a portion of the troops shall be placed upon the line, if I understand it correctly. What I want to know is, whether it is the intention of the resolution to direct the President, in his disposition of the United States troops, or whether it is merely a request? If it is the latter, I have no objection to it, but if it is an order, I shall protest against it. I protest against directing, or ordering, the President in this manner, by any single branch of Congress.

Mr. LANE. It is simply a request. But I desire to explain why I want the troops disposed of in the manner provided for in the resolution.

Mr. DISNEY. With the permission of the gentleman from Oregon, I desire to explain what is the precise effect of the resolution. I have just read it, and it is merely an inquiry of the President, as to what steps have been taken for the protection of the emigrant; and if no steps have been taken, it requests him to make that disposition of the rifle regiment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. But there is a second clause in the resolution, which directs the President to cause a portion of this regiment to be placed along the line.

Several MEMBERS. "Read the resolution."

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CABELL. The gentleman from Oregon now will see that I was correct in saying that the latter clause of the resolution directs the President in this matter.

Mr. LANE. That clause is predicated upon the supposition, that the troops will be ordered to Oregon. In that case, it requests the President to place a portion, as will be found necessary, upon the emigrant road, and a portion upon the great road leading from Oregon to California. I desire to say to the House, that there can be but two great roads leading to Oregon on which any danger is to be apprehended—such is the shape of the country; one road leads directly from St. Joseph, via Fort Hall, to the Dalles on the Columbia, and upon that road the Indians are the most warlike and ferocious in their habits. They are well armed and fierce.

Mr. HEBARD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LANE. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I have about so much to say, and I don't like to be interrupted.

Mr. HEBARD. I have but a word to say. The gentleman is aware, that by the Constitution, the President is made the commander-in-chief of the Army and disposer of our military forces. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman, whether he ever called upon the President and requested him to make this disposition of the troops?

Mr. LANE. It gives me great pleasure to answer the gentleman. I did call upon the President in person, and then I addressed him a letter; and if the House will allow me, I will read that letter. A copy of it was furnished to Senator Gwin, who read it in a speech upon the defenses of California and Oregon the other day. It was published in the debates of the Senate, and I now have a copy of the Union in my draw containing it.

[Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, here interposed, and presented as correctly enrolled,

A bill to carry into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo; and

An act for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain.]

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask the gentleman one question. I wish to ask whether this regiment has not been ordered to the frontiers of New Mexico and Texas, as a mounted regiment, by the Secretary of War, upon the ground that it was not adapted to service in Oregon—that in that country mounted troops were not as efficient as infantry? I desire also to know if the gentleman now wishes to change the plan of operations in the military department of the Government, and order, at great expense, a regiment to return to Oregon?

Mr. HEBARD. I desire to know what answer the President returned to the application of the gentleman from Oregon. I do not care about having the letter read.

Mr. LANE. If gentlemen will permit me to have the letter read, I then will answer both the inquiries of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HEBARD.]

The letter was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, December 12, 1851.

To his Excellency the President of the United States:

SIR: A sense of duty prompts me to call your early attention to the peculiar condition of things in Oregon. I have been a citizen of that Territory for nearly three years; have traveled the settled portion of it all over; had much to do with the Indians, and know them, perhaps, as well as any other man, and understand the wants of the American citizens there; and can say to you, that for their protection and for the protection of others emigrating there, that troops be garrisoned on the great road from St. Joseph via Fort Hall to the Dalles of the Columbia, and also on the road from Oregon to California, are absolutely indispensable for the protection of life and property. I know that I need but call your attention to the condition of things there, and present the facts within my knowledge, to secure your aid and prompt action in the premises. The suffering this season for the want of troops to protect emigrants and others en route to Oregon, and from Oregon to California, has been terrible; and certainly this Government ought and will, I have no doubt, afford protection to her citizens in a country so remote and exposed as are all persons traveling either on the emigrant road to Oregon or on the road from Oregon to California. There are but these two roads south of the Columbia on which troubles are to be apprehended. The shape of the country, and its stupendous mountains, are insurmountable barriers to the location of roads of importance. A garrison of two or three companies of horse—or infantry, if a mounted force cannot be had—on each of these roads—at the Grand Round, for instance, on the emigrant or northern road, and in the Rogue River Valley, on the California, or southern road, should be established. The moral influence that the establishment of these posts would produce upon the minds of the Indians would do much towards keeping peace with them, and afford the protection to American citizens that they are so justly entitled to.

It may be well here to mention, that the road from Oregon to California forks in the Rogue River Valley; the main road passes south of the great Clatsop Mountain to the source of the Sacramento, thence down that river to its great valley, and to Sacramento City; the north branch passes by Klamath Lake to Fort Hall. A small party of emigrants have gone that route this season and got in safely. This route was opened by Jesse Applegate, Scott and others, in the year 1846, for the purpose of affording to emigrants a pass into the southern portion of Oregon; but such was the suffering of the first emigrants on this route that it has been but little traveled since, but will, I have no doubt, be much traveled if a garrison should be established in Rogue River Valley, as above suggested.

I have been thus explicit, in order that you may understand the condition and wants of the country which I have the honor to represent, with the full belief that you will take such steps as may be necessary to give protection to the citizens there, and emigrants and others, traveling to and from Oregon.

Herewith I enclose two communications from Oregon for your perusal, which you will please return to me. One of the writers I am well acquainted with, (Mr. Applegate, one of the early settlers of Oregon.) He has done much to bring the country into requisition, by exploring, opening roads, &c., &c.; a sensible, reliable man. With Mr. Simons I have no acquaintance, but have no doubt of the truth of his narrative.

With great respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH LANE.

Mr. LANE resumed. I called upon the President in person, and the House is aware that he is of the opinion that the army is too small to afford all the protection that is necessary for that country, and that he has recommended an increase of the army. I called upon the Secretary of War recently relative to this matter, and asked him if any troops could be sent to that country to afford protection to the emigrants bound to Oregon this season? I have received no definite answer from either of them. The President feels friendly disposed towards that country; and I have no doubt he is anxious to do his duty. I make no charges at all. But I charge that the rifle regiment has been diverted from the purpose for which it was raised and organized. It ought not to have been ordered to Texas, if it has been done.

I say to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] that if an order has been issued from the Department here, ordering that regiment to Texas, it ought not to have been done. It was not raised for Texan service, or for the protection of the boundary between Mexico and the United States; and I can say another thing to the gentleman from Texas, that they are not in the exposed condition as are the people of Oregon, and as are the people of the States on their way there; and I know that it is an easy matter in Texas to raise a force in sufficient numbers to whip all the Indians who may make any attempt upon their settlements. I know there is no State more gallant, or a people more ready to turn out on duty at a moment's warning, than the people of Texas. I know their ability to defend themselves, and that all they want is to know that their services are needed, and they are ready to go out and destroy the Indians. But how is it with Oregon? In that portion of Oregon, for which I ask protection, there is not any settlements within seven hundred miles. The population even in the settled portion of Oregon is small; and can this House for a moment expect them to raise a force of five hundred or even three hundred men, and send them out with subsistence seven hundred miles from a settlement? Emigrants bound to Oregon, when once within the settlements, are as safe as they would be in Washington city. But look at the district of country they are to pass over to get there; and who is to give them protection? Can the people of Oregon turn out and do it? They could do it; but recollect that every man's time there is worth five dollars a day to him. Now, if you want to raise a force you must first say to the volunteer that you will give him five dollars a day, and find him horse, arms, and equipment. And is that Territory, with only three thousand voters, able to do that, and can they extend to the country the protection which it ought to have? Why induce people to go there? Since I have been here I have received thousands of letters making inquiries about Oregon, and making known to me that certain persons in the neighborhood of the writers were making preparations to start for Oregon. And every man who has made up his mind to go there this year must leave the settlements soon, and be at St. Joseph, with everything necessary for outfit on the way, by the first of May next. Can we begin, at this late moment, to authorize the raising of the force required, arm it, and get it ready in time to render them the necessary assistance? No, sir, we cannot; and if we fail to do it, what will be the result? Let me tell you, it will be the tomahawking, in the most cruel and barbarous manner, of the men, women, and children, and helpless families, who have been induced to go to Oregon, and that, too, after a regiment has been raised for the specific purpose of protecting them. Why should it be ordered to Texas? I am not sure that such an order has been made. If it has been, I ask, in the name of the people who will be exposed to Indian depredations, that it be countermanded, and let the regiment go to Oregon, where it should go, and where it is the duty of the President to send it. If he fails to do it, I shall never cease to say that, in my judgment, he has failed to do his duty. I am sure it will be wrong to divert that regiment from that country. The regiment arrived in Oregon at a time and under circumstances the most unfavorable. It was just at the time of the breaking out of the great gold excitement, and in the midst of that excitement many of the privates abandoned the service, disgraced themselves by forsaking their flag and going off in search of gold. But a portion of them did not desert, and a sufficient number were left to afford all the protection necessary for that country. They said, We have enlisted for this service, and will remain and serve out our time, get our discharge, and then become citizens of this country. While the regiment was in that condition, and able to render service to the country, and afford the protection we needed, they were ordered from that country to this; and from what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] now says, I suppose it is now ordered to Texas, and is upon the way thither. If so, it is all wrong. A portion of that regiment, contrary to justice, contrary to law, in my judgment—I am no lawyer, but if I make a declaration which is not warranted, I wish some good lawyer to correct me—I say a portion of that regiment, raised for service in the Oregon Territory, before they were ordered out of it, were transferred from that regiment into the dragoon service, and ordered into California. That was, in my judgment, a violation of the contract between the Government and the soldier, and would, I have no doubt, have entitled him to his discharge, if he had taken the proper steps for that purpose in due time. Nevertheless, the transfer for the time being was fortunate for us, because it gave us their invaluable services a few weeks longer than we would have had them if they had gone off with the rifles. It happened to be just at the time the troubles broke out among the Rogue river Indians, when our people were being murdered by them, when they were thus transferred from the rifles to the dragoon service. The troops thus transferred consisted of two companies, one commanded by Captain Walker, the other by the gallant and lamented Stewart, who, after covering himself with unfading laurels in Mexico, unfortunately fell in that distant land, in defence of his exposed countrymen. The people of Oregon will ever cherish his memory, and I hope and believe they will, as they ought, erect a monument to perpetuate it.

Those troops, the whole being under the command of Major Kearny, moved in the direction of the Indian troubles; and it was my fortune, with a few gallant Oregonians, to fall in with them then, also including some brave volunteer Californians, and witness and participate in the service which followed. But for those troops, who remained only two weeks in the country, and at the seat of Indian troubles, the whole outside settlements would have been crushed. But they gave the Indians a severe flogging and a severe chastisement, such a one as has kept them, up to the present time, in that quarter, apparently friendly, though they have killed a few whites since; but that is so frequent an occurrence that we hardly think of asking this Government to avenge it. The killing of one or two men is no unusual thing there; but we take care of these comparatively small disturbances ourselves. But when it is evident that there is a general hostility, as there is now, it is the imperative duty of the Government to interpose and give us aid.

Now, while I am speaking of that Indian war in which Captain Stewart fell, I would like to say to South Carolinians, of which State he was a native, that he was an ornament to that gallant State; that he was the best officer of his age in the American Army, and more familiar with the duties of an officer than any young man in the Army. He had distinguished himself in every battle he was in in Mexico—and he was in nearly all of them—and fell fighting for the people of Oregon. I learned, about the time of his death, that a portion of his salary was annually or quarterly devoted to the benefit of his mother, now, I learn, living in this District. I hope that some friend of that man will take care to propose that a pension be granted to that mother; a mother who bore such a noble son is entitled, in my opinion, to the benefit of a pension.

But I am wandering from the subject. Now, as to the resolution, if there is anything in it, any wording of it that is not just right, I am willing to change it. I do not ask to direct the President of the United States. He is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and I do not want to abridge his authority. I want to request him simply. If the word request is not in the resolution, I want it inserted. I want to draw the attention of the President to it, and request him, in the most respectful manner, to extend to the people of Oregon Territory that protection which they are entitled to, and that he will send out that regiment to Oregon, which was raised by a law of Congress for that service. Now, to undertake to raise a regiment, and get them on the ground in time to protect emigrants this year, is out of the question. No such thing can be done. If members of this House are willing to afford this protection, they must request the President, or the President must do it without request, to send out some troops now in the field, and who are regularly in the service.

If you let it go this year, there is no certainty of getting them the next; and when will we get that protection our citizens need and demand? I am satisfied myself, that the Army is sufficiently large for all purposes. Is there not more troops stationed along the Southern States than are needed there? Why are troops needed in the old States of the Union? Why not send them where they will be on duty, affording protection to the unsettled portions of our country? Or is it that Oregon is too far off, and nothing is cared for the people out there? I am satisfied that there are enough in the regular Army, properly distributed, to afford all the protection that Texas may need, without calling upon her gallant sons to turn out, and to defend themselves. That, however, they have been in the habit of doing ever since an American lived there. They are enough to afford protection to Texas, and also to emigrants en route for Oregon. Why not let the rifles come to Oregon—let the troops who have enlisted for that service serve out their time there? Now, let me again ask that the resolution be amended so as to make the resolution read "request" instead of "direct," wherever it may occur. I trust the vote to reconsider will not prevail.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to say that the inquiry I made of the gentleman from Oregon, was not dictated by any unfriendly feelings towards the purposes of his resolution, but it was to see what position we were placing ourselves in with reference to the subject before us, and in relation to the President. The objection with me is not what the gentleman himself supposes it to be. It is not because it is not sufficiently indicative of a request, but because I regard a request here even as improper as a direction. I did not pay much attention to the resolution when it was introduced and adopted in the first instance, from the confusion in the Hall. When my attention was again called to it by the motion to reconsider the vote, it occurred to me that we were acting entirely in the dark. It is utterly improper, and I regard the making of a request of the President upon an important matter like this as equivalent to a direction. I ask gentlemen here how we stand with reference to the President of the United States in making a request of him to do an important act when we ourselves know nothing about his ability to do that act or its propriety? There is the difficulty in the resolution. It is not that it is couched in disrespectful terms; it is not that it is a direction, but the objection with me is, that we are requesting the President to do that of which we ourselves have no information, of which we know nothing of the facts either as regards his ability or the propriety of doing the action. It is with that view I hope the vote upon the adoption of the resolution will be reconsidered. If the gentleman has applied to the President to do this very thing, and he neglected to do it, the gentleman, without any information upon which to base our action, comes forward and requests him to do it. I want to know if it is not implying indirectly a censure upon the President? It is presumed that if he knows his duty he will discharge it. If we know it better than he does, we must have facts upon which to base our action. I think we are acting improperly in requesting—in directing action upon the part of the President which he has declined to take himself—all the responsibility resting with him, unless some better reason is furnished than has been suggested.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. My objection to the resolution does not grow out of the object at which the gentleman from Oregon seems to aim. I have no doubt that it is entirely proper that Oregon, and that the emigrants upon their way to Oregon, should be protected. It is not from any doubt of the correctness of the gentleman upon that point I oppose this resolution, but my opposition grows out of a matter of principle. This House alone has nothing to do with posting the army. The two Houses of Congress have nothing to do with it. The Congress of the United States can raise and support an army, but the President of the United States is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army; and we have no authority upon the face of the earth—the two Houses of Congress have no authority—to give any direction in respect to the posting of the army. That is a matter which belongs exclusively to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. Why, sir, even in time of war the Congress of the United States have no jurisdiction in respect to the Army except to raise and support it.

Mr. LANE. I will state to my friend that the resolution does not direct the President, it only requests him.

Mr. BAYLY. I do not think, so far as the question of principle is concerned, that that alters the case. We make a request where we have no authority to act, and that request is addressed to one who has the authority, and who is responsible. I shall not comment upon the views which have been already presented, that we have not information upon the subject, because my opposition does not grow out of the matter of expediency nor propriety, but out of the question of power. I was about to say when I yielded to the gentleman from Oregon, that even in time of war the authority of Congress over the Army is confined to the raising and subsisting of it. This was a matter carefully considered in the Convention which adopted our Constitution. The power was given to Congress to declare war, to raise and support an army, but the power to wage war is given to the President of the United States as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. Congress may, if it believes after a war has been declared, that it is unnecessary and improperly prosecuted, withhold supplies, but it cannot take the command of the Army. The only way by which the Congress can control the President of the United States in his command over the Army is by withholding supplies. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HEBARD], that in a case of this sort a request is equivalent to a direction. It is a matter in reference to which we have no right to make a request, as a question of power, and besides of expediency, where we have no information. It is the duty of the President to protect the frontier, to protect our emigrants, to protect our distant settlers; and I have no idea of this House interposing to relieve him from any of his responsibility, by directing him in this matter. Well, sir, what will be the result? Just as certain as the sun will rise to-morrow, if you pass this resolution directing the rifle regiment to be posted as the gentleman from Oregon suggests, it will be made the excuse for asking the addition of one or two regiments to our forces. This matter was gone over at the last session of Congress, and I agree with the gentleman from Oregon, whose ability and experience has confirmed me in the truth of the opinion I expressed at the last Congress, that we have army enough if properly posted; but it is not for this House to say where they shall be posted. Congress have not the information, nor the power.

Mr. HOWARD. After the statement of the honorable Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] it must be apparent to the House what the object of this resolution is. It is to overrule, if not by the direction of the House, at least by its opinion, the action of the President, as Commander-in-Chief of Army, or the Secretary of War, in relation to the posting of the Army. To say nothing of the power to which the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] has adverted to do this, in the absence of all inquiry and information, it is at least a most extraordinary proceeding. Why have these troops been ordered, not from Oregon, but California? The Secretary of War has told you that mounted troops are unnecessary in Oregon; that mounted troops cannot operate in Oregon and California with as much facility as elsewhere; that they are not adapted to that service.

Mr. LANE. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me, I will put him right in relation to that matter. No troops are fit for Indian service but mounted ones. What was the description of force with which Major Kearny operated? What was the kind of force commanded by Capt. Stuart when he was killed? I was with them a short time after the captain fell, and recollect of making a march of fifty miles in a day, and having in that several skirmishes. Could men on foot have done that? We galloped into an Indian town and knocked down every Indian that could be seen, and then went in a gallop to the next town, and after overrunning that, we went to the next, and in that manner they conquered in two weeks the most ferocious and warlike Indians in Oregon Territory. This was done by troops raised for the Oregon service, and who had been transferred to the dragoon service. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, that none but mounted troops can operate there. Infantry will not do there except to garrison a post. These troops did good service in Mexico. Mounted, as they were, they could gallop a whole day, as did the Texas troops, and on the next fight three or four Indian battles.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not pretend to set up my knowledge of the character of the country in Oregon to that of the Delegate of that Territory; but what I said was this, that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and the Secretary of War had decided that that country was not adapted to mounted troops, but that infantry was a better species of force. Now, by a resolution of this House we undertake to overrule that opinion and to order back to Oregon a regiment which has been ordered from California to the frontier of Texas and New Mexico. It strikes me that this ought not to be done, and that it would be presumption in this House, without investigation, to overrule both the President and the Secretary of War in relation to the disposition of the Army, or any portion of it. Let an inquiry be instituted by the Committee on Military Affairs, and let a proper investigation take place, before the Administration is set right upon this point if it is in an error; but do not let a resolution introduced in this manner, attempting to make a disposition of the Army, be forced through the House without investigation. The idea of the Administration is to give so much infantry as is necessary to Oregon and California, and to place upon the great prairies, the great open plains, the mounted troops, because they can operate in no other place to advantage against the Indians. There is another consideration in connection with this matter. By this time the regiment has arrived in Texas, which is under the command of General Smith, who is in command of the eighth military division, and great expense has been incurred in their removal. You propose, upon a simple resolution, to order their second removal, thus incurring a double expense. If you undertake that, you ought at least to do what you failed to do at the last session of Congress, give the Quartermaster's Department sufficient money wherewith to operate upon the frontier in defence of the country.

It appears now, from the report of the Secretary of War, that the Quartermaster's Department is destitute of funds and is in debt, and it also appears that he cannot protect the frontier, for the very reason that he has no money in the Quartermaster's Department with which he can mount and move troops, and with which he can make a disposition of any portion of the Army. It strikes me, it would be a far more useful inquiry to ask of the Committee of Ways and Means, why they have not, before this late day, reported the deficiency bill required by the estimates of the Secretary of War, thus providing for the necessary wants of the Army.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but these estimates were referred on the 13th of last month.

Mr. HOWARD. If these estimates were referred in this House on the 13th of last month, it seems to me that between the Committee of Ways and Means and the printing of the House, there has been a perfect stop-law to all the business.

Mr. DUNHAM. That may be all true; but it cannot be expected for the Committee of Ways and Means to act upon the estimates sent to the Speaker's table, before they are printed and sent to the committee. They will act upon them when in their hands; and if the gentleman wants a remedy, he must find it there, and not in the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOWARD. When the public interest demands immediate action and immediate appropriation; when the whole frontier is in a state of warfare and bloodshed, it strikes me, the Committee of Ways and Means could act upon a matter which embraces no more than six pages of printed matter. They could act upon these estimates without their being printed at all.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman if they have authority to do that, when the House have ordered these estimates to be printed?

Mr. HOWARD. At whose instance were they ordered to be printed? Was it at the instance of the Committee of Ways and Means? The motion proceeds from the Committee of Ways and Means, or one of its members, and neither is it strictly true, because they are ordered to be printed that they must remain forever in the hands of the printer, unless he chooses to execute the printing.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] is laboring under an error, when he says that the deficiency estimates were referred early in the last month. The deficiency estimates, as far as his appropriation is concerned, were presented to this House some time in January, but they have not reached the Committee of Ways and Means in full yet. I have the estimates that have been printed and furnished to the Committee of Ways and Means, but the majority of the members of that committee have not received them yet. The gentleman says we can act upon the manuscript communication that has been made to this House. We do not get possession of the manuscript copy, and we have not the right to it. It is ordered by the House to be taken to the printers—it is taken there, and there it lies.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I call the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to order. The question of printing has nothing to do with the resolution before us.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think my friend from Florida is getting a little excited.

Mr. CABELL. I insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must decide that it is not in order to discuss the question of printing.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] was allowed to discuss this very subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not inclined to call either the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] or the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to order.

ron] to order, but the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] rises to a question of order—

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas, I will make a statement of facts. The estimates which concern him directly, are not the only estimates upon which the committee have to form a bill. Now, if it were true that half a dozen pages of printed matter were all, the committee might take them up, if they had possession of the printed communication, so as to act upon the subject; but the gentleman forgets that there is a large deficiency in the Quartermaster's Department—a large deficiency in the Navy—a large deficiency in the Department of the Interior. All these things have to constitute one bill, and we cannot venture to take up every item—

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled to call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HOWARD. I was stating, when I was interrupted, why this regiment could not be removed back again to Oregon, for the simple reason that there is no money in the Quartermaster's Department to defray the expenses. That, I insist, is pertinent to the resolution. Now the gentleman says that the Committee of Ways and Means have not had the estimates before the committee. They have had the estimates of the deficiency bill for the Army, which were referred on the 13th of the last month.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I rise to the same point of order. The remarks of the gentleman from Texas have nothing to do with the question.

Mr. HOWARD. That is a matter for the Speaker to decide.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not inclined to regard the gentleman from Texas as wandering entirely beyond the boundaries of this debate, in referring to the means of the Government for transferring these troops. The gentleman from Texas is in order.

Mr. HOWARD. On the 13th of January, this matter was referred and ordered to be printed, and for about two weeks the printed estimate has been in my desk—how much longer in my box, I do not know. It seems to me, in a matter of so much importance—involving the security of the whole frontier—the efficiency of the whole Army itself—that this is a late day for the deficiency bill, and not yet brought in, and which ought to have been passed long ere this. The necessary money to make the Army efficient should have been appropriated, as almost the first business of the House, because, whatever may be the fault in relation to the defenses of the country, I undertake to say that it rests here. It does not rest with the Administration. I feel bound in justice to the Administration to say, that at the last session of Congress they called repeatedly both for men and means to enable them to make the frontier defenses efficient. By the course pursued at the last session of Congress in cutting down the estimates one half in the Quartermaster's Department, and that, too, without any reason, and by the refusal or neglect of the House this session to this late day to supply that deficiency in any degree, the fault rests here; and the frontiers of the country are not protected in the manner in which they ought to be. I wish at the proper time to move to strike out all the resolution from the word "resolved," and to substitute in its place "that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into it," &c.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the motion is to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion now for reconsideration.

Mr. ORR. Will that motion come up to-morrow, if not disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged question—the motion to reconsider—which may be called up to-morrow.

Mr. ORR. I hope my friend from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] will give way to a motion to adjourn. I make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to understand the condition of the question, should the House now adjourn. If the motion should come up to-morrow to reconsider, and it be carried, then I should think the resolution, having come in under a suspension of the rules, will go over until next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to the opinion, that if the vote is reconsidered, the resolution will be before the House in order for consideration.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is only when a motion is made, and not acted upon, that it goes over to the next suspension day. This has been acted upon.

On motion, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House, the papers of John Gordon for purposes of reference.

Mr. GORMAN, I yielded to my friend to make the motion, upon the supposition that this matter would come up to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that, as a privileged question, it may be called up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will call the attention of the Chair to the fact, that after the House has disposed of the privileged question, then the resolution, coming in under the suspension of the rules, must, I think, according to the practice of the House, go over to the next Monday—the suspension day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, in examining the practice of the House, that the subject has come fairly before the House, and after being reconsidered by the House, it will be in order to vote upon the resolution. But the Chair states distinctly, that it reserves to itself the right of determining that matter when it comes up.

Mr. JONES. The Chair will find upon examination, that the practice of the House, at the last session of Congress, when a similar question arose, was as I have already stated.

On motion, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House, the papers of John Sloane, for the purpose of reference to one of the Executive Departments.

The question was then taken upon the motion for adjournment, and it was agreed to.

The House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 10, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WADE presented a memorial of the assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in Clinton county, Ohio, praying additional compensation; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DOWNS presented the memorial of William R. Glover and James J. Wright, praying that the Postmaster General may be authorized to contract with them for the transportation of the mails between New Orleans and Vera Cruz, touching at Tampico; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BADGER presented seven memorials of assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in North Carolina, praying additional compensation; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the memorial of John A. Dix and John A. Bolles, sureties of the late R. S. Dix, praying certain credits in the settlement of his accounts as a paymaster in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a petition of the President and Directors of the Mississippi and Atlantic Railroad Company, praying the right of way and a donation of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of John Mitchell, praying to be allowed back pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, two petitions of citizens of Illinois, praying the right of way and a donation of land for the construction of a railroad from Shawneetown to the Mississippi river, opposite to Saint Louis; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of Jeremiah Twarny, praying compensation for a coat lost while he was aiding in extinguishing the fire in the Capitol on the 24th December last; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLEMENS presented the petition of William O'Brien, a lieutenant in the late war with Mexico, praying three months' extra pay and his traveling expenses home; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FISH presented a petition of bank officers and others, of Albany, New York, praying the establishment of a Mint in the city of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a memorial of merchants, shippers, ship-owners, underwriters, and others, of Bath, Maine, praying that the act of March 3, 1847, for the reduction of the costs and expenses of proceedings in admiralty against ships and vessels may not be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have been requested to present the memorial of Mrs. Mary Ann W. Van Ness, praying an extension of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, so as to allow her an appeal from a decision of the circuit court for the District of Columbia, which I move to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not like to interpose any objection to sending anything to the Committee on the Judiciary that properly belongs to it. I do not say that this matter would not have originally belonged to that committee, but it has been before that committee, and I have once brought in a bill in connection with it. As well as I can recollect, her former memorial—and I have no doubt this is the same—was, that we should review a certain law, and make a retrospective law so as to allow her to go to the Supreme Court of the United States for a revision of her rights. That bill, which was presented, was considered and disposed of by a large majority of this body, and I should therefore be reluctant to allow such a matter to go back to a committee which has already decided upon it; and I would inform my friend from Illinois, that if it goes back again to that committee, it will share its former fate. He had better, therefore, propose some other reference.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have merely presented the memorial at the request of this respectable lady, and if the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary objects to its being sent to that committee, I presume the better way will be to let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator persist in his motion?

Mr. SHIELDS. I would ask if there has been an adverse report upon this subject? If there has, I will change my course.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps not directly an adverse report, because her application was reported upon by a bill. That bill proposed to give her the right of appealing to the Supreme Court by a law which reached back to cases that had arisen within a period of five years, cases which had been decided under the laws then existing; in other words, to give her the benefit of a law operating retrospectively, when, in fact, no such law existed. We decided against that, and introduced a bill which should operate prospectively, giving to all persons a right to appeal to the Supreme Court from the decisions of the Circuit Court.

The memorial was then laid on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Chester Griswold, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLEMENS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of the officers of the first regiment of Louisiana volunteers, submitted an adverse report; which was read.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of a company of sappers and miners, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to repeal the act entitled "An act for the organization of a company of sappers, miners, and pontoniers," approved May 15, 1846; which was read and passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of documents relating to the claim of John P. Duval, and that they be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of documents in relation to the claim of the widow of Brevet Major J. P. J. O'Brien, and that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Thomas Pember, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief, which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING REVENUE TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PEARCE. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred Senate bill No. 44, entitled "A bill in addition to and amendatory of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of the accounts of the public officers, and others, who may have received moneys arising from military contributions, or otherwise, in Mexico,'" approved March 3d, 1849, to report the same back to the Senate, with an amendment, and ask that the bill and amendment be printed.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be printed, as a matter of course, and it is usual also to print the amendments.

Mr. GWIN. In connection with this subject, I wish to give notice to the Senate, that when this bill comes up for consideration, in accordance with a resolution of the Legislature of California, I will move to make some important amendments to it. During the last Congress I brought this subject to the notice of the Senate, prepared a bill, and had it referred to the Committee on Finance, authorizing the payment of the moneys collected from the people of California, in violation of law and the principles upon which this Government is based, of no taxation without representation, to the government of that State. At that time the Committee on Finance reported upon the bill, striking out the whole of it, and authorizing the payment to us of $300,000 instead of the millions of dollars which had been paid by us in violation of our rights as citizens of the United States. Since the adjournment of the last Congress, the Legislature of California has acted upon this subject, and passed resolutions in regard to it by a unanimous vote, which I presented to the Senate some time ago, and will now read.

As this is a question of great importance to the people of that State, I will beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read the resolutions, which truly represent the unanimous voice of the people of the State:

Joint Resolutions relative to the Civil Fund of California.

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly, That we view with feelings of surprise and regret, the action of Congress in refusing to refund to the State of California, moneys collected in her ports and from the honest industry of her citizens previous to her admission into the Federal Union.

Resolved, That we consider the fund heretofore known as the Civil Fund of California, to be the property of this State, and that any other appropriation of it by the General Government we hold to be unjust and ungenerous. Taxation without representation, is a principle always repudiated by the American people.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives be requested to continue all honorable exertions to procure from Congress the recognition of our right to the moneys taken from us by the General Government, and an appropriation to that effect, and that we call upon our sister States to see that this act of justice is performed towards the youngest of the Republic.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to present to our Senators and Representatives, each, a copy of the foregoing resolutions.

JOHN BIGLER,
Speaker of the Assembly.
DAVID C. BRODERICK,
President of the Senate.

APPROVED, May 1, 1851.

JOHN McDOUGAL.

It is known to the Senate that I had these resolutions referred to the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member; and I moved, in committee, that a bill be reported accordingly. I am sorry to say that I stood solitary and alone in favor of the introduction of such a bill; and I now give notice, that when the bill reported comes before the Senate, I will make an appeal to the representatives of the several States of the Union to interfere and render effective this act of justice to California.

In addition to this, there was another class of meritorious claims which were referred to the same committee, designed to make some compensation to those patriotic citizens who prevented a number of American citizens from starving by furnishing them with support en route, and on their arrival in that country. This proposition was made by me, not alone in consequence of the suggestions of my own mind, although it met my cordial approbation, but in accordance with instructions from the Legislature of California. The resolution is this:

Joint Resolution for the relief of Captain William Waldo, Charles N. Hall, and J. J. Petrie.

Resolved, (the Assembly concurring.) That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence and efforts to obtain an appropriation from Congress for the relief of J. J. Petrie; also, for the relief of Captain William Waldo and Charles N. Hall, for money expended by them in affording relief to the destitute and suffering overland immigration, while acting under the direction of the Sacramento Relief Company; and that the Governor of this State be requested to forward this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JOHN BIGLER,
Speaker of the Assembly.
DAVID C. BRODERICK,
President of the Senate.

APPROVED, April 5, 1851.

JOHN McDOUGAL.

I also made an unsuccessful effort to have some appropriation made to pay these just and meritorious claims, but I was equally unsuccessful in that effort. And I give notice, that when this bill comes up, I shall introduce an amendment to carry into effect the object of that resolution of my State.

That the Senate may be apprised of the principle I am contending for, I will have printed with these remarks the bill relating to this subject as originally introduced by me:

A Bill to authorize and direct the payment of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California, which were collected in the ports of said State as a revenue upon imports, since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled

*That it is hereby made the duty of the President of the United States, to cause to be paid into the treasury of the State of California, all the moneys collected in the ports now embraced within the limits of said State, from the thirtieth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, to the day on which the collector appointed under the act entitled "An act to extend the revenue laws of the United States over the territory and waters of Upper California, and to create a collection district therein," approved March three, eighteen hundred and forty-nine, entered upon the duties of his office: Provided, That such moneys so to be paid to the State of California, shall be exclusive of all sums properly expended under the directions of the military de facto governors, for the necessary expenses of collecting the same; and also all sums properly and justly expended under the directions of said officers for the purpose of carrying on and sustaining the de facto government, which existed from the conclusion of peace between the United States and Mexico, until the present State government of California went into operation.*

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it is hereby made the duty of the President of the United States to cause to be paid into the treasury of the State of California, all moneys collected as a revenue upon imports in the ports now embraced within the limits of said State, from the day on which the collector appointed under the act aforesaid, approved third March, eighteen hundred and forty-nine, entered upon the duties of his office, to the day on which the State of California was admitted into the Union: Provided, That all such moneys so directed to be paid over shall be exclusive of all amounts properly disbursed in collecting the same.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it is hereby made the duty of the President of the United States to cause to be paid into the treasury of the State of California, all moneys collected in the ports now embraced within the limits of said State, as hospital and light dues, and which moneys were so collected prior to the day on which said State was admitted into the Union.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to provide and prescribe such regulations, vouchers, and other forms, as in his judgment will be best calculated to carry out the foregoing provisions of this law.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to discuss this subject at the present time.

Mr. PEARCE. I was about to say, that as the bill is not now under consideration, I did not consider it proper to reply to the remarks of the Senator from California; but when it is before us for consideration I hope I shall be able to vindicate the course of the committee.

Mr. GWIN. I will meet the Senator there.

ENGROSSED BILL PASSED.

The following engrossed bill was read a third time and passed:

An act supplementary to several acts of Congress, providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes; and,

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXILED IRISH PATRIOTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien and Thomas F. Megher and their associates.

Mr. SEWARD, (who has the floor on this subject.) Mr. President, I move the postponement of that resolution until to-morrow, and that it be the special order for that day, at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. It is now a special order, and if postponed it will come up to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I make the motion to postpone until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

NON-INTERVENTION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Mr. CLARKE's resolutions on the subject of non-intervention. The pending question is the amendment offered by Mr. CASS to the amendment of Mr. SEWARD.

Mr. CASS addressed the Senate at length on the subject. He considered the subject in all its bearings; he deprecated any demonstration of violence, and maintained the right, justice, and propriety of an open declaration of our opinion upon the subject of violations of the law of nations. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. CLEMENS. For the purpose of enabling the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] to conclude an unfinished speech, I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed.

until the day after to-morrow, and made the special order for that day.

Mr. BADGER. I have no objection to the motion of my friend from Alabama to postpone this subject till the day after to-morrow, but I object most decidedly to commencing my speech to-day when it is almost three o'clock.

Mr. CLEMENS. The Senator need not proceed until to-morrow.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the motion will be agreed to, as I want to ask the Senate to go into Executive session on a matter of some importance.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 10, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER, Chaplain of the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TROOPS ON THE OREGON ROUTES.

The SPEAKER stated as the first business in order, the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted, yesterday, a resolution offered by the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] in reference to routes to Oregon; and that upon that motion the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] was entitled to the floor.

On motion by Mr. HAVEN, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Peter Covil, for the purpose of reference to the Pension Department.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, to ask leave to report back from the Judiciary Committee, Senate bill amendatory of the act entitled 'An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts, approved July 29th, 1850.

The bill is a very short one, and may be disposed of in a few moments. There is a very urgent necessity for its passage.

Mr. GORMAN. What disposition does the gentleman propose to make of the bill?

Mr. KING. I desire to put it upon its passage. It will not take two minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to it.

The resolution, the vote on the adoption of which, it is proposed to reconsider, is as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House what steps, if any, have been taken to insure the protection of emigrants en route to Oregon, against the depredations of the Indians of that Territory; and in case no such steps have been taken for that purpose, that he be requested to cause the regiment of Mounted Rifles to be placed upon duty within the Territory of Oregon—the service for which said troops were created—and that he cause a portion of said regiment to be posted upon the main emigrant road from St. Joseph, on the Missouri, between Fort Hall and the Dalles of the Columbia river, and the remainder thereof to be posted in the Rogue River Valley, on the road from Oregon to California, said troops being necessary for the protection of emigrants and others traveling said road.

Mr. GORMAN. The subject now under the consideration of the House is the resolution offered by the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] in regard to the disposition of certain troops, for the protection of emigrants en route for that Territory. I have but a few observations which I desire to submit to the House, and I shall not occupy the time allowed under the rule. Those remarks I intend to address, as nearly as I can, to the subject-matter under consideration, without any further digression than may seem indispensable to my purpose.

This resolution is introduced for the purpose of obtaining certain information from the President. It also suggests to the President, as I understand it, the propriety of placing upon the Oregon route the mounted rifles. The point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House is this: that under the law creating that regiment, the mounted rifles were raised for the Oregon service; they were to be put upon that service, and for the identical purpose proposed to be accomplished by the gentleman from Oregon, in his resolution. The Secretary of War, in his last annual report, makes the following allusion to the subject; he says, speaking of the force already sent out to Oregon:

"This force is deemed entirely inadequate for the protection of the inhabitants, particularly of Oregon. The Governor of that Territory has represented this fact, and has urged an increase of the force stationed within it. The means now at the disposal of the Department do not enable it to comply with this demand."

The Governor here alluded to, is the honorable gentleman now representing that Territory. The Secretary of War proceeds:

"In my last annual report I recommended the creation of a new regiment of mounted men. The withdrawal of the regiment of mounted riflemen from the Pacific has, to some extent, diminished the necessity of creating an additional regiment of that description of force, as that country is not peculiarly adapted to cavalry, and its place may well be supplied by infantry."

Now, it is in reference to that recommendation, and to the subject-matter of the resolution, to which I would ask the attention of the House. The Secretary of War will excuse me if I differ from him in relation to that recommendation, for no gentleman upon this floor has a higher regard for him, as a gentleman and a man, than I have. But the idea of a recommendation to this Congress to substitute infantry for mounted troops upon the frontier service, is so anomalous in its character, and so much in conflict with all military experience, that it struck me at first blush as the most remarkable recommendation I ever heard. The idea of using infantry in preference to mounted troops on the exposed frontier, against Indians marauding to and fro, committing depredations at one point to-day, and at another point forty miles distant to-morrow, does seem to me to be a most remarkable recommendation.

But, sir, what was the object of raising this rifle regiment? I say to the House, that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] has stated it correctly. This rifle regiment had its origin in the recommendation of the President of the United States to the Twenty-ninth Congress. That recommendation will be found in the Congressional Globe for the first Session of the Twenty-ninth Congress. The President said:

"For the protection of emigrants, while on their way to Oregon, against the attacks of the Indian tribes occupying the country through which they pass, I recommend that a suitable number of stockades and block-house forts be erected along the usual route between our frontier settlements on the Missouri and the Rocky Mountains; and that an adequate force of mounted riflemen be raised to guard and protect them on their journey."

That recommendation of the President of the United States, made at the commencement of the Twenty-ninth Congress, brought the subject up for consideration before the Committee on Military Affairs. It will be found, by reference to page 726 of the same Congressional Globe, that the subject was debated, and that the very point made by every individual who participated in that debate was, that these troops were to be a guard for emigrants going to Oregon. No member upon this floor, who looks into the history of the law by which this mounted regiment was created, can come to any other conclusion—first, from the recommendation of the President; and secondly, from the debate upon the subject—than that the regiment was raised for that service, and for that alone.

Mr. Benton, in the Senate, made a speech on the subject—which will be found in the Congressional Globe—in which he took this same view; and Mr. Gordon made a speech in this House, in which he also took the same view.

Mr. Gordon, in his speech, said:

"Now, in the opinion of the President, it is necessary that, in this particular service, there should be a particular force—a force of mounted riflemen; and that the ordinary infantry force of the country would not answer the purpose. What is the object of establishing these block-house forts, and stockades, and organizing this force of mounted riflemen? It is not only to protect emigrants on their way to Oregon, but to encourage their emigration thither. And unless we are prepared to abandon, not only the assertion of our claims, but our claims themselves, to Oregon, and to present ourselves in opposition to the President, we are bound to carry out his recommendation, and, as I think, to establish this force in that region of the country."

And again:

"Now, for the purpose of protecting emigrants on their way to Oregon, and of encouraging their going there, I am in favor of having one regiment of riflemen mounted, in whole or in part, at the discretion of the President, for this peculiar service, between the Missouri and the Rocky Mountains, as well as for the purpose of keeping the Indians in check, and preventing hostilities on their part against our frontier settlers."

There was not an individual who spoke upon the subject, in either end of the Capitol, who took any other view than that this mounted regiment was designed for the protection of emigrants to Oregon. The President, or the Secretary of War under his advice and counsel, has ordered the mounted riflemen from the Pacific border, and left but few, if any, troops on that long and exposed Indian frontier, and these troops are not mounted. This force are troops that are stationed at certain points along other routes, and this route proposed to be protected by this mounted rifle regiment is now defenceless.

Mr. EVANS, (interrupting.) I wish to ask the gentleman if I am to understand him to say that President Taylor, or President Fillmore, withdrew that mounted regiment?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir, I do say so.

Mr. EVANS. My impression is—and I was here at the time—that they were withdrawn by President Polk.

Mr. GORMAN. Well, the mounted regiment was withdrawn—

Mr. LANE, (interrupting.) If the gentleman will allow me I will put this matter straight. I pledge my word, that the gentleman from Maryland has got this thing wrong in his head. The regiment was ordered to Oregon in 1849, and arrived there in the fall of that year; they remained there until the spring of 1851, when they were ordered out of Oregon by the then Administration. That is the true history of this regiment. The gentlemen from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] fell into a great mistake yesterday, when he said that the regiment had been ordered from California and not Oregon. That regiment never was in California.

Mr. EVANS. I did not say that it was.

Mr. LANE. No; but the gentleman from Texas did.

Mr. GORMAN. I had supposed that it was done under the administration of President Taylor, but I care not under whose administration it was done—whether under that of President Polk, Taylor, or of Mr. Fillmore. I do not, upon this occasion, intend, by any means, to attack the administration either of President Taylor or of Mr. Fillmore. My object is to get at the point, whether the law originally passed did not intend the service of the mounted riflemen, for this Oregon route. If so, I ask, has not the Government, in ordering that force from the Territory, gone in direct opposition to the intention of the law? That is the point. It is the privilege, under the law, of the President of the United States to order troops to whatever positions he pleases; but the idea of taking mounted men from the frontier of Oregon—a mountainous country, and that portion which is not mountainous being a large part of it prairie—the idea of following Indians who almost invariably travel on horseback, with infantry, carrying their muskets, rifles, canteens, boxes, and provisions, is certainly the most novel recommendation I ever heard in my life. I know of no man in this country—there is none in this broad land, save, perhaps, one man, and that is the gallant Commander-in-Chief of the Army—to whose opinion in relation to the protection of the country and its frontier, I would pay more deference than to that of the gallant Representative of Oregon. He has given you a history of that country, and many details of the Indian depredations.

Sir, a few commanders such as he is, would soon rid this country from Indian depredations upon that frontier. And when his opinions and recommendations come in conflict with those of the Secretary of War—I care not how well the Secretary may be posted up in the military affairs of the United States—his recommendation would not weigh much with me in comparison with that of the man whom I know marks out his designs with judgment and skill, and executes them with a dexterity and promptness not surpassed, if equaled, by any other man who ever drew a sword or stood before an enemy. I say, when I come to see the recommendation of that man, I feel that I am safe to follow it—a man, of whom, I can say to the country and the world, that in the hour of peril and danger, he sees at a glance the weak points of the enemy and his own force—and avails himself of the advantage instantly. He then goes into the contest with an eye that never blinks and a heart that never falters, combined with a love of country and a patriotism that has no superior in this broad land; when I come to hear him recommend that a regiment of mounted

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

NEW SERIES.....No. 33.

rifleman shall be stationed upon that frontier, because they are needed there; when I hear him in behalf of the woman and children upon that frontier; when I hear him recount the dangers to the emigrant and the difficulties in getting to that country;—all these, in connection with his character, not only as a military man and as a prompt executioner of his designs, but as a man who speaks with judgment and reason upon this question, I am well satisfied that the opinions and judgment of such a man ought to be deferred to, especially after he has traveled over that country, and therefore can speak from personal observation.

The question is, whether the vote on the adoption of this resolution shall be reconsidered. This resolution, as I understand it, is to request the President to order a portion of the rifle regiment to be posted upon the emigrant route, from St. Joseph, Missouri, between Fort Hall and the Dalles of the Columbia river; and the remaining portion to be posted in the Rouge River Valley.

Now, I am not going to question the right of this House to direct the President in this matter. I am not going to contend that the President has not the disposition of the troops. I take it that this resolution will not interfere with the powers or the rights of the President, whatever they may be. I think it very clear, that if the resolution is adopted, the President will not consider it in the light of an instruction or as an order. At least, he ought not so to regard it; and if he does, it will not be in accordance with the understanding of this House; not in accordance with the intentions of the mover of the resolution.

While I am upon the floor, I will say that I believe we ought to raise another regiment. In the last Congress I voted against raising that regiment, but I have since seen the necessity of it. The present regiment was ordered to the frontier of Texas, and we must have a force in Texas. We must have a force in California and New Mexico, and that force must be a mounted one. I must, however, be allowed to differ, perhaps, with the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] in one thing. That force, in my opinion, should be a regular one. Volunteer forces invariably cost double the amount, and are not any more efficient than regular troops. They may do very well in a charge, or in an attack, but I believe that economy will dictate that we should have regular troops, and mounted too, upon the frontiers of California and Oregon. They have been ordered, as it is said, and as I know, to Texas; and there is no doubt that the frontier of Texas needs their protection. There is no doubt that their protection is needed at Eagle Pass, and in the vicinity of Santa Fe. Correspondence, which I have lately received from one of the judges of that Territory, states that murders are daily; that the Indians are committing frequent depredations upon the property and persons of the emigrants and travelers, and upon passengers from village to village. Various communications, which I have received from the vicinity of Eagle Pass, state that there have been frequent and violent depredations committed in the district represented by my honorable friend from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD.] They need protection. The Government, however, have seen fit to withhold from the Oregon route the troops which were raised for the Oregon service. That this regiment was raised for that purpose, and for that alone, the petitions presented previous to the passage of the law raising the regiment, show. The title of the bill shows the fact, that it was raised for that purpose; and whether this order for their removal comes from the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, from the Secretary of War, or from whatever source it comes, I say that it was in opposition to the spirit of the law which created this regiment.

But the objection urged by gentlemen to this resolution is, that it is directory to the President. Now, if it is read as I think it ought to be read, it is not directory in its character. As I understand it, it simply requests the President to cause this thing to be done. And if I am right in this position, the resolution ought to pass. If I am right in my assertion that this regiment was raised for the purpose of serving in Oregon, and it has been ordered to be removed to another part of the country, I say that the resolution ought to pass. If we had assurance, however, which could be relied on, that another regiment could be raised, I perhaps should not insist on that regiment being directed to take its position upon the routes to Oregon. Another regiment, in my opinion, ought to be raised. This bugbear which has been perpetually crying out against an increase of the Army, has hitherto prevented our raising another regiment. But we know that the frontier of California has been exposed to frequent attacks and depredations by the Indians. Our frontiers have, during the last year, been left so much exposed, that I may say hundreds of men women and children—emigrants not only to Oregon, but to New Mexico and California—mail carriers and officers of your Government, have been robbed and murdered; and yet, in the face of all these facts, there is a disposition here to withdraw all the troops from the whole Pacific frontier. How is this whole frontier to be protected against the depredations of the Indians since the withdrawal of all the troops from that frontier, exposed as it is for three thousand miles? Why, the idea that, in a Government like ours, the Secretary of War should recommend to Congress to disperse with the cavalry of the country and to substitute infantry, with a large and almost boundless extent of frontier such as we have, is so anomalous in its character, that it needs only to be stated to be seen.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to make but a suggestion, and it is for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to the fact, that he seems to be doing some injustice to the recommendation of the Secretary of War. Now, as I read the report of the Secretary of War, and as I understand his views expressed in his report made to the President at the commencement of the present session, he entertains the same views precisely as have been expressed by the honorable gentleman [Mr. LANE] who introduced the resolution, in reference to the service of this mounted regiment, and also the same views which the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] entertains. In fact, he says the regiment of mounted rifles is necessary for the purpose of protecting our frontier, and keeping our treaty stipulations with Mexico. He insists that this kind of troops are the only efficient force for preventing these Indian incursions. But in looking over the whole field, he seems to regard the frontier of Texas as in more immediate danger than either Oregon or California. If my friend from Indiana will allow me, I will read a brief extract from the commencement of that report.

Mr. GORMAN. If the gentleman will allow me to read first, he may then read as much as he pleases.

Mr. HAVEN. I only desire to read in regard to this single point.

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman will find that the Commander-in-Chief, General Scott, and the Secretary of War, differ upon this subject.

Mr. HAVEN. I am speaking now with reference to the harmony of views entertained by the Secretary of War, by the gallant and honorable gentleman from Oregon, and by the gentleman who now occupies the floor from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN.]

The Secretary says:

"As infantry is of but little use in a service which consists principally in pursuing small parties, who are always mounted, I recommended in my last report the raising of an additional mounted regiment, equipped with special reference to this service. Congress not having adopted this recommendation, all that remained for the Department to do was to make such a disposition of the force at his disposal as would most effectually protect our own territory, and fulfill our treaty obligations with Mexico. Accordingly, prompt measures were taken to concentrate on the confines of Texas and New Mexico as many of the troops adapted to this service as could be spared from other quarters."

Then, again, he says:

"The Indians in California and Oregon having always been of an unwelcome character, and disposed to cultivate the good will of the whites, it was thought that the services of the regiment of mounted riflemen might be dispensed with on the Pacific. It was therefore ordered to Texas. Brevet Major General Smith, its commander, was put in command of the eighth military department, and Brevet Major General Hitchcock was ordered to succeed him in the command of the Pacific division."

Again, he says:

"It would not be safe, however, to rely on any pacific policy, however wise and just, for the protection of our fellow-citizens in that remote region. Since the withdrawal of the regiment of mounted riflemen, the military force on the Pacific is extremely small. By the return of the Adjutant General, appended to the report of the General in Chief, it appears that the entire force stationed on the Pacific amounted, at the last return, to only seven hundred and thirty-six men. This force is deemed entirely inadequate for the protection of the inhabitants, particularly of Oregon. The Governor of that Territory has represented this fact, and has urged an increase of the force stationed within it. The means now at the disposal of the Department do not enable it to comply with this demand."

Now, whatever may have been his reasons for sending this regiment from Oregon, he takes precisely the same views of the matter as the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Oregon. But he says that there is no very eminent dangers to be apprehended from the Indians in Oregon. From the habits and condition of those Indians, they are not warlike in their character, and it is not necessary to have these mounted riflemen to pursue these small parties, to ride them down, as the gentleman says. Or it is not as necessary to have them there as it is upon the frontier of Texas. I do not desire to detain the House, I only make this suggestion, that there is a harmony of views in reference to this subject, between the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Oregon and the Secretary of War.

Mr. GORMAN. The clause to which the gentleman has referred, is to be found in the report of the Secretary of War. After repeating what he had said to the last Congress, he goes on to say:

"In my last annual report I recommended the creation of a new regiment of mounted men. The withdrawal of the regiment of mounted riflemen from the Pacific has, to some extent, diminished the necessity of creating an additional regiment of that description of force, as that country is not peculiarly adapted to cavalry, and its place may well be supplied by infantry. Nevertheless, by the report of the General-in-Chief, it will be seen that he considers not only this additional regiment of cavalry, but also an increase in the rank and file of the infantry and artillery as indispensably necessary. While I feel some hesitation in urging upon Congress any addition to the force on the frontier, where the support of troops is attended with such enormous expense, I cannot but acknowledge the force of his remarks and the weight that is due to his recommendation. I hope, therefore, that the matter will be submitted to Congress."

Does he understand the Secretary of War to come to the conclusion to which he alludes? If so, he is mistaken. The Secretary of War is recapitulating what he has said before.

Follow the Secretary of War. He says:

"In my last annual report I recommended the creation of a new regiment of mounted men. The withdrawal of the regiment of mounted riflemen from the Pacific has, to some extent, diminished the necessity of creating an additional regiment of that description of force, as that country is not peculiarly adapted to cavalry, and its place may well be supplied by infantry."

And he goes on to say, and you will see that he differs from the Commander-in-Chief:

"Nevertheless, by the report of the General-in-Chief, [Gen. Scott,] it will be seen that he considers not only this additional regiment of cavalry, but also an increase in the rank and file of the infantry and artillery, as indispensably necessary."

The Secretary of War further says:

"While I feel some hesitation in urging upon Congress any addition to the force on the frontier, where the support of the troops is attended with such enormous expense, I cannot but acknowledge the force of his remarks and the weight that is due to his recommendation. I hope, therefore, that the matter will be submitted to Congress."

Thus it will be seen that General Scott wishes another cavalry regiment, and the Secretary of War hopes the matter will be submitted to Congress. He differs from General Scott, and says that infantry can be used there, and that cavalry is not fitted for that service. And why? He has shown that such are his opinions by withdrawing the mounted rifles; and in doing so, he has perpetrated an act which I regard to be in violation of the spirit of the law, as clearly indicated in the title of the law. It is the point to which I am directing the attention of the House, that the withdrawal of those troops from Oregon is wrong. The remark has force as made by the gentleman from Oregon, in reference to the settlements in Texas, that Texas is better capable of taking care of themselves than those upon the frontiers of Oregon and California. The frontiers of Texas have never been incapable of defending themselves. They need this force, however, to avoid the necessity of defending themselves. It is the duty of the Government to defend them. The people of Texas are quite as warlike—if I may be allowed the expression—as the Indians themselves; and they make better Indian fighters than are the Indians themselves. One Texan regiment can whip two or three Indian regiments. I heard a distinguished gentleman from Texas, a few days since, say they could outrun them, whip them, and fight them two to one at any time and under any circumstances. If the President of the United States had taken into consideration the population of Texas, their character, their ability, and willing disposition to defend themselves, he would have found an additional reason for keeping that regiment where the Congress of the United States intended it to be kept. I insist that the act of the Secretary of War in withdrawing those troops is in violation of the spirit of the law, and in derogation of the intention of Congress; and it is a violation, too, of the principles of humanity. The cause of humanity demands that these troops should be kept upon the route of the emigrants to Oregon. You have thousands and thousands of people going over the plains this year. Thousands passed over them last year; and the papers of the whole country are full of accounts of Indian depredations, murders, and robberies of every character and kind. But, sir, in the face of all that, in the face of the preamble of the law, and in the face of the intention of this House, the Secretary of War has seen proper to withdraw those troops from the point where it was intended that they should be stationed.

Mr. HAVEN. There is no preamble to the law.

Mr. GORMAN. When I used the word preamble, I intended the word title. I did not intend to elaborate this matter by any means. I wished only to speak upon a point which struck me as being important, and having investigated that, I only intended to say to the House, that the proposition of the Secretary of War in recommending infantry upon the frontier instead of cavalry, is so anomalous—with all due respect to that highly honorable gentleman, for whom I have great regard—that I could not refrain from making the remarks which I have made.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not intend to make any remarks upon this resolution, because I did not suppose, that after the discussion on yesterday, that it would be pressed to a vote, but would be materially modified or utterly withdrawn by its mover. I see, however, by the argument of the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] who has just taken his seat, that it is probably his intention, and as I apprehend, the intention of others also, to force us to a vote upon this resolution just as it is; and therefore it becomes necessary to reply to his remarks, and to urge the reasons why such a resolution should not pass at all, but be reconsidered at once, and then voted down.

In the first place, this resolution contemplates taking from the Executive power of the country the control of the Army of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say I have no such intention. I have no objection to vote to so amend the resolution as to preclude the idea the gentleman seems disposed to defend.

Mr. BROOKS. I am happy to hear it, but I must take the resolution as it stands until it is modified by the mover. It does not propose to take it in legitimate form, but—

Mr. LANE, (interposing.) I should like to have the unanimous consent of the House, to amend the resolution at this stage—though I do not know as it is competent to do so, upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed—by inserting the term request in its proper place, in connection with the other terms in the resolution, so that the whole resolution shall be merely a request, and not a command. If that could be done, certainly there could be no objection to the resolution. I stated on yesterday that I was anxious to have it so modified.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope that at the proper time the gentleman will have an opportunity to amend the resolution. Lest it may not be modified, however, to satisfy me hereafter, I must take the resolution as it stands now, comment upon it as I find it once passed by the House, express my objections to it, and, after that, I intend to animadvert upon some of the observations and principles laid down by the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN.]

The resolution, as it stands, Mr. Chairman, would take from the President of the United States, who is, by the Constitution, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and invest the House of Representatives alone with that high authority. We should have, not one constitutional Commander-in-Chief, but two hundred and thirty-odd Commanders-in-Chief, all honorable members of the House, by no action of Congress, be it remembered, but by the sole action of this House, assuming powers against the Constitution, and without even the coöperation of the Senate. The singular spectacle would be presented of the House alone undertaking the direction of the Army, in defiance of two of the coördinate branches of the Government, whose legislative authority, separately and distinctly, is quite equal to any which the House has or can exercise under the Constitution of the United States. Nay, the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Oregon is not only thus utterly objectionable in principle, but, if possible, yet more objectionable in its details,—for he asks the House not only to take from the President the general direction of the army, but to go into details, and to station a portion of that army at three several and distinct points, between the old western frontier and the frontier of Oregon, all of which he specifically names in his resolution. I am quite convinced, then, that when the honorable gentleman from Oregon further reflects upon the tendencies of his resolution, upon its high assumption of authority, upon its utter impropriety, upon its subversion of the great principle which guided our constitutional fathers in their careful division of powers among the three branches of the Government, and upon its utter powerlessness, too, if he should persist in calling upon the House to pass it, and could obtain sufficient votes, he will not press the resolution to a vote, but will withdraw it, or suffer it to be laid upon the table. True, it may be in the power of this House to resolve, that it will have the sole control of the sword of the country, but it is a resolve against and in despite of, the Constitution, altogether beyond its legitimate authority, and a resolve which it can never maintain, and which, therefore, no member should ever try to pass. The House of Representatives has no sole authority whatsoever over the Army. Congress may, in concert with the Executive branch of the Government, create an army, and the hold the House has over it, is over the supplies, over the public purse. The disposition of the Army, when legislation has done with it, is altogether in the Executive, under the limitation of the Constitution. Congress holds the purse, the Executive has the sword. The powers of the two are complete and distinct in their respective constitutional spheres, and this is the only case, I will venture to say, in which the House has ever before attempted, by a resolution confined to its own body, not only to dispose of the Army, but to fix its stations or encampments in particular spots. I will not, however, press that point further, because the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] has manifested a proper disposition at least to modify the resolution, in which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] concurs.

The point I now propose to discuss briefly, is the necessity of the changes which have taken place in the Army of the United States, by the authority of the Executive of the United States. The great and original difficulty lies in the Army being too small for the protection of this now vastly extended country, with, if I may be allowed so to speak, its inner and its outer frontiers—its frontier on the Atlantic and Pacific, on Canada, the Provinces, in Mexico; and its inner frontier, embracing numerous and powerful tribes of savages. An Army which was once, perhaps, sufficiently large for guarding the coasts of the United States and Canada, is now utterly inadequate for the protection of the extended frontiers of the United States, when they have gone beyond the Rocky Mountains, embraced tribes of savages, whose names even are yet scarcely known to us, and occupied the extensive coasts of Oregon and California. We have doubled our country, quadrupled the difficult and dangerous duties of the Army, but yet the Army remains as it was, and by some it is expected to be omnipresent, because hitherto it has been omnipotent almost everywhere.

A still greater difficulty, however, arises from the action of the House of Representatives of the United States during the last session of Congress. The Executive, through the Secretary of War, submitted his estimates to the House of Representatives, and the action of the House was such as to curtail those estimates one half. Those estimates were cut down over $2,000,000 by the House, and whatever disorder and trouble there has been in California, in Oregon, or in Texas, or elsewhere, the Executive is not responsible for it, for it is the Congress of the United States that has deprived the President of the power to properly garrison the different sections of this vast and widely-extended frontier. It was impossible for the Executive of the United States to do the justice to Oregon or to California that the gentleman from Oregon now demands, because the House of Representatives deprived him of the means, and even intimated to him, that it was unnecessary to garrison Oregon and California at all. If the honorable gentleman will refer to the discussion upon the Army estimates, in the House of Representatives last year, it will be found that the great argument for the curtailment of the estimates from $4,000,000 to $2,000,000, was, that Oregon and California needed no soldiers; that the people there were fully capable of protecting themselves, and that the Indians of Oregon and California were not of a warlike character. The further argument was, that the expense of maintaining troops there was so enormous, and so much beyond that of supporting them upon the Atlantic States, and on the old western frontier, that it was the duty of the Executive to withdraw the troops which had been stationed in Oregon and California, and restore them to the frontier of Texas, or transport them to the Atlantic borders. Upon these arguments the House of Representatives justified itself in curtailing the estimates of the Executive from $4,000,000 to $2,000,000; and this was the only good reason gentlemen had for doing what they did altogether in the dark. This was the argument made upon different sides of the House. In one quarter it was made by gentlemen opposed to all armies whatever—by peace men. In other quarters, without reference to parties, it was justified upon the ground that it cost so much for the Quartermaster's department in Oregon and California, that the Army should not, and must not be kept there. The expenses of provision, and of supporting and maintaining troops there was so great, we were told, that they considered it the duty of the Executive to remove the great body of the military from that distant and expensive frontier to the old frontier of the country, or, at least, to take them to the Atlantic coast. The House acted upon these plausible arguments, and the Congressional Globe will show that the spirit of that argument prevailed through all the discussion. The House having done all this, and taken the responsibility, now let not honorable members shirk off that responsibility upon the Executive, but share it; for he not only followed their advice, but they compelled him to follow it by crippling him of all power or means to disobey it.

The gentleman from Indiana in the course of his remarks, bestowed a brilliant eulogium upon the military services of the honorable Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] leaving an inference, as it seemed to me, that when he spoke on military matters, all others should obey. I would not, if I could, rob him of one of his well-deserved military laurels. Indeed I heartily concur in most of the remarks of the honorable gentleman. But the gentleman from Oregon, I apprehend, gallant as he is, would find himself entirely unable to do more than the Executive or the Secretary of War has done, if Congress did not vest him with the necessary means to provide for garrisoning his own Territory and the State of California. Sure I am, if the honorable Delegate from Oregon, instead of being only a Delegate, had been actual Commander-in-Chief, he could do nothing more than has been done, if Congress had blindly cut down his quartermaster's estimates $2,000,000 at a swoop. If there be any doubt of this, let the honorable gentleman from Indiana give vitality to his eulogies, and bring to bear the power of his party to place the Delegate from Oregon in the position of the Executive of the United States; and if he is placed in that condition, I venture to say, without the power of the purse, without supplies on the part of this House, he could do no more than the present Executive has done for the protection of Oregon and California.

There is another argument of the gentleman from Indiana on which I wish to have a word or two, and that is, this rifle regiment was created for the especial benefit of Oregon. I have no doubt in the early intention of the creation of that regiment it was designed for Oregon, or the frontier of Oregon, but I have yet to learn that any regiment of this country, any portion of the Army of the United States, however it may have been dedicated in its original creation, belongs to Oregon, or California, or Texas, or to Maine, Louisiana, or Pennsylvania, or to any people but the people of the United States. It is a new doctrine, now for the first time introduced here, that a regiment created at the start for a particular purpose, especially when, as in this case, the House deprived the Executive of the power to carry out the original purpose, that such regiment is dedicated forever to a particular Territory or State, and cannot be taken wheresoever and whithersoever it may be the duty of the Executive to take it. The Army belongs to the whole United States, and wherever its services are most wanted, it must be stationed, and of all that the Executive power is the proper judge.

Now, in the great body of the remarks of the gentleman from Oregon, which go to show the necessity of protecting Oregon and California, and the emigrants on their way there, I heartily concur. I have a great respect for his military experience, and am willing to be guided by it, whenever he will provide the men, money, and means. Oregon must be defended. The route from Missouri or Iowa must be made free, easy, and safe. Nobody will go further with him than I will on all these points. But he has not taken the wise and proper steps to carry out the purpose of his remarks. He should go before the Military Committee of this House; he should lay his complaints before the Committee of Ways and Means; he should then address the House, and enforce upon them the necessity of increasing the Army and increasing its expenditures, to maintain the Army at the costly points where he desires to station it. He should enforce upon Congress the necessity of providing better for the transportation of the subsistence for the troops. After he has convinced the committees of the House, he should then come before the House with his arguments that he submitted yesterday upon the passage of this resolution, and if the House respected them as I do, he could then at that more appropriate time carry all before him. Hercules in the White House cannot help him. The only useful Hercules is in these members here.

I forbear, Mr. Speaker, now from any further remarks upon the original resolution—not because I do not object to it in any and every form, except as it is to go to a committee, or is limited to an inquiry. I object to it for the reasons I have stated, but whenever the gentleman will give it the proper form and proper direction—the legitimate and usual direction—he shall have my hearty concurrence in bringing about all he desires.

Mr. CARTTER. I do not propose to trouble the House for the few minutes I shall occupy their time, with a discussion of the propriety of transferring a regiment of mounted riflemen from one frontier of the Republic to another. I take it for granted, that so far as that branch of the service is concerned, no gentleman upon this floor can be better enlightened upon the subject than the honorable mover of this resolution. His position to the western territories, his military experience in connection with the service, constitute, for all purposes, in my judgment, the law of my conclusion upon that subject. I propose to trouble the House with a protest simply against the extraordinary doctrine promulgated by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY] on yesterday, and echoed by the honorable member from New York [Mr. Brooks] to-day. It was but a few days since that this House had under consideration the Mexican indemnity bill. If I recollect right, the honorable gentleman from Virginia then rose in his place and solemnly protested against the interference of this body in the disposition of the money that it should appropriate for the liquidation of the debt under that treaty, and assumed then, that the expenditure was the subject solely of Executive discretion. The same gentleman, upon this bill, pursuing the same line of argument, assumes, and gravely urges, that the disposition of the Army is the subject solely of Executive direction and discretion. Now, I conceive, if this Executive tendency of thought, Executive tendency of action, in this body, shall be continued to be pursued until we are subsidized to the thought and action, there will be nothing left but an Executive. The proposition, in connection with the money, puts the purse into his hands. The proposition in connection with the sword here, puts the sword into his hands: and with the Treasury and the Sword united in the Executive, you have an end of the independence of this body. This is what I understood to be a chapter in Federalism when I was learning the A B C of politics, without claiming to have got out of them yet. These are two of the chief attributes of monarchy. And you carry out the doctrine that the President has the sole power of disposing of the defensive force of this Union, and that he has the power of appropriating, under his discretion, the money as accorded by this body, and there is an end of your legislative power. I deny that the Executive has any right to transfer a regiment created for the defence of any given frontier of this Republic to another frontier. I deny that he has any right under the Constitution to withdraw it from the service indicated in its creation. It is true, he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army. The Constitution says so. What does it mean? It means that he is the drill officer of your forces. It means upon the field of battle as the war-making power—as the defensive power of the Union. It means that when you have created a military force, it is at his disposition; that he has the right to mount the cockade and command it; and that is all it means. But the moment you give to him the power of stripping one frontier of its defensive force and transferring it to another, you assign to the Executive the legislative protecting power of this body. You effectually subject the legislative sovereignty of the country to the Executive sovereignty. Why, if he may, under his sole discretion, withdraw forces specifically directed by law to be employed upon an unguarded frontier of the Republic, you throw the whole safety of the empire into a single man's hands; you repose the entire safety of the Republic in a single man's judgment; and when you superadd the other doctrine, that he has a right to manage the funds of the country as he sees fit, independent of the action of this body, you put into his hands the means of executing that purpose. Now, sir, I deny both propositions. I deny that we have not the power to determine that we will make a defence subject to law. When we make that defence, when we raise the force for it, I deny any higher or further power to the Executive than the power of commanding the force at the place where, and the time when, you order him in the law. With the detailed disposition of the Army he does hold the sovereign command, but that disposition must be subordinate to and revolved within the legislative purpose declared in creating the force, and disposing the point of defence. I have never before heard such an alarming doctrine proclaimed here as the doctrine that has just been promulgated. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] says in his argument that Congress is to blame for transferring the regiment from Oregon to Texas. Did Congress do it? No! It appears the Executive has done it. They did not give the order to march. They did not divert this portion of the Army from that point. But the President rests the necessity for doing it in the defenceless condition of Texas. Now, the honorable Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE], to whose opinion I yield my own judgment in reference to that matter, with whatever rights I have upon the subject, assumes that your standing Army is large enough. It is large enough for action under the explanation of the Delegate from Oregon. It is large enough, God knows, in the item of expenditure. But again: he says it is the fault of Congress in attempting to retrench it. We did not attempt to retrench it; but one sentiment entered into the reduction of the Quartermaster's department, to which the gentleman alludes, in the last Congress. The reason why $2,000,000 was taken out of the Quartermaster's appropriation for the Army, as the gentleman from New York will well recollect, was, that for some mysterious, unprecedented reason, it was ascertained that that Department had swelled up its appropriation from $1,500,000 to $5,000,000. That was the reason. It was ascertained furthermore, in following the detail of that Department, that the moneys appropriated by the Federal Government were passed through one contractor to another, to another and another and another, and each one levying upon this appropriation the impost of a highwayman.

[Here a message was received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary.]

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] permit me to interrupt him? I am quite sure whenever he makes a change, he will bring it to a point and make it specific. He has made an allegation against the Quartermaster's department which involves a high officer of the Government of his own party. I am very desirous he should make his charge specific, so that we may know who are these contractors and what are their names.

Mr. CARTTER. I will make it specific; I do not care who it involves, whether my own party or the gentleman's party. God knows the gentleman's party has sins enough in this line to answer for, when they had to bring forward their leader here, with $50,000,000 of appropriations, to accuse Congress of having crippled the service by not giving more; when it is necessary, after an appropriation of $50,000,000 in the last Congress, that you should load down the commencement of this Congress with deficiency bills amounting to $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, and then get up in the sixth and seventh week of the session and complain that this modest Administration—this economic Administration—this honest Administration—this sound Administration—this cheap government Administration—this retrenchment Administration—this reform Administration, [laughter,] cannot go on successfully with the operations of this Government without you stop the ordinary business of legislation for the purpose of shoveling into their insatiable maw millions more. [Laughter.] I say I care not who it strikes; I care not whether it strikes political friend or foe. It is recorded upon the pages of that Department, that it has become the mere tool in the hands of speculators, for the purpose of wasting the public revenues. The enormity of the appropriation was so great, made apparently so great at the last Congress, that in a time of profound peace, with no armies for aggressive war, and no necessity for armies for an aggressive war—when the whole world were extending their hands to shake the hand of peace with us, and when our neighbors upon this continent were holding their hands to God to protect themselves against us;—at this time of profound security and unbroken peace, the resources of the Quartermaster's department should run up to $5,000,000, is a thing unheard-of in the history of expenditure. Now, if there is a Democrat in that crowd, I am not a cousin of his. I want that distinctly understood; and the gentleman may take him into a party that will sympathize with him just as quick as he pleases.

I rose simply to protest against the repudiated doctrine, that the Executive Department has a control of your money, and that he is entitled to a discretionary control of the sword. I have answered that purpose briefly, and have nothing more to say.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It was not my intention to mingle in the debate upon this resolution. I had no desire to say a word in the discussion; but such frequent allusion has been made to the vote of the last Congress, which cut down the appropriations for the Quartermaster's department of the Army below the estimates submitted by that bureau, and such direct reference to those who voted that reduction, as the persons on whose heads should rest all the responsibility for whatever difficulties have occurred upon the frontiers, that I cannot refrain from the declaration that I am one who so voted—who struck from those estimates, at a single sweep of the pen, two millions of dollars—and I stand here now ready to vindicate the propriety of my course on that occasion.

Sir, I can readily understand how the difficulties and expenses of army transportation increased with the extension of the frontiers of the Republic; but I cannot understand, I never have understood why the estimates of the Quartermaster General should go on increasing from year to year in an arithmetical progression, since the frontiers have been so extended. Our number of troops remain the same from year to year; the Commissary General has the same rations to furnish; the Adjutant General the same personnel to wield; the geographical area over which the Army operates is the same. Yet, year by year, the estimates for transportation swell, until this item alone has risen to between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. Sir, this item of "transportation" in the Quartermaster General's estimates, attracted, very naturally, the attention of such members of this House as desired to keep the Army expenditures within due bounds. I know that, though we struck down those estimates last session $2,000,000, we are yet to have a contest over the items. They are to be brought forward again in a "deficiency bill," and the estimates of the Executive bureaus are to be enforced through that instrumentality, if Congress will submit to it. Sir, the Executive department—the Estimating department of this Government—is not an unresisting subject under the knife of the economist. It will require all the nerve of the boldest legislator to teach gentlemen at the other end of the avenue, that when Congress reduces the estimates they are to learn to keep the expenditures within the sum allowed to them. It has so frequently been the case that the Executive bureaus have successfully disregarded the expressed will of Congress, that I am prepared to see a deficiency bill enter this Hall, restoring the estimates refused last March by Congress, and accompanied by the declaration that the appropriation allowed for the whole year has been expended in the first six months. If I remember aright, such a result was predicted when Congress refused the estimates to the Quartermaster General. It was replied to that prediction, that the representatives of the people would teach the lesson of obedience to their will by making an example of the officer who should dare to disobey the will of Congress, when clearly and unequivocally expressed. The report of the "deficiency bill," covering the same estimates so refused, will bring Congress to the test proposed. We shall see in a few days whether this body has sunk to the level of a mere office in which to register Executive edicts—whether the subalterns of the Army in possession of bureaus are superior to the Congress. If I can obtain the floor on the hearing of this "deficiency bill," by which this deficit of two millions is proposed to be restored to the Quartermaster General's bureau of the War Department, I shall avail myself of that occasion to review the vote to which reference has been made, as well to vindicate its correctness, when cast, as to show conclusively the high obligation which rests upon Congress to adhere to it, "at every hazard and to the last extremity."

I have not looked at the history of that debate as it is reported, but I remember that the estimates furnishing rations to the troops were made upon the basis, that the transportation of a barrel of pork to some of our posts in New Mexico was to cost some $50! We saw in those estimates, that the article of wood, for fuel, in New Mexico was to cost some $12 or $14 per cord. To justify this, it was said the wood had to be packed some thirty or thirty-five miles. Why was this? Because the troops were stationed in the towns and not in the Indian country. We thought it would be better to move the soldiers to the wood, than to bring the wood to the soldiers, at the price estimated for. Think of it, sir: a barrel of pickled pork sent from the city of New York to Santa Fé, at a cost of $50 for the mere transportation!! We know enough of the character of New Mexico and California to be apprised of the fact, that in those countries, beef cattle and sheep were pastured, and that the inhabitants subsisted upon this kind of meat. We know that, by existing law, the President of the United States could substitute one ingredient for another in the ration of the soldier, in order, by such change, to adapt the ration to the capacities of whatever country the soldier might be called to serve in. We thought that our soldiers in New Mexico and California might subsist on beef or mutton, smoked, dried, salted, or fresh, as well as upon pork, and that it was not indispensable to the maintenance of our military establishment, that the contracts for army supplies should be made in the cities of the Atlantic. Sir, we are in the habit of making contracts in New York and Boston, which should be made in the West. Some of us thought that, instead of sanctioning the transportation of pork at $50 per barrel from New York or Boston, through the west, and thence over the plains to New Mexico, we would leave the President to the judicious exercise of that power, with which he was already invested, and whereby, by a mere change of the soldiers' meat ration, he could subsist the force upon the productions of the country in which the army should be stationed, and so dispense with such extravagant transportation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not make an assault upon the administration of the War Department, but when my votes are made the subject of comment here, or elsewhere, I shall and will vindicate their propriety. They are cast always according to my judgment of the interests of the people, and without reference to the demands of party. They may be wrong, but I can always communicate the reasons which operated upon me to give them. It was unnecessary to cast any reflection upon those who voted with me upon the occasion referred to, and for one, I do not mean to permit any text to be taken in this way, without accompanying it with a proper commentary. Let me say, that the idea is preposterous, that the difficulties upon the frontiers, or in the administration of the War Department, have arisen from the vote referred to. The estimates upon which that vote was given were made for the year ending 30th June, 1852. Six months of that fiscal year have not yet expired. The allowance for the whole year has surely been sufficient for the first six months. It cannot be, then, that frontier difficulties which transpired six months ago, were caused by a supposed deficit which will appear six months hence! Look to the Quartermaster's estimates for the present year, and to his expenditures for the first six months. Let us see the details, and place your finger upon the retrenchment that has occurred, out of which the difficulties on the frontier have originated, or to which, in any degree, they can be traced. I dare to say, no man here can specify such item. I dare to say, that the examination will prove that the expenditures have been made according to the estimates, and that the calculation has been indulged to cover the deficit of the next six months by a new appropriation. If this shall appear, with what propriety can the fault or the responsibility be attributed to Congress? No, sir; we have enough sins to answer for, without charging those upon us of which we are innocent. I do not enter upon the avowment that any fault has been committed—that the difficulties upon the frontiers could have been avoided; but if there is any fault it originates from the manner in which the troops have been posted, not from the manner in which they have been supplied, when posted.

The troops of the Army are posted by the Commanding General of the Army. The duties of the Quartermaster General, Adjutant General, Commissary General, are merely ministerial, and are all under the supervision of the Commanding General. The Republic is divided into so many military departments, and these are subdivided into so many military divisions, which are made up of brigades, regiments, and companies. Each has its peculiar chief, but the arrangement and order of the whole belong to the Commanding General. At the end of the quarter the Adjutant General exhibits to his Chief the returns of the Army. He shows, in a consolidated return, the whole personnel of the Army, the strength of each department, and you may run back in these returns and find the strength of each division, brigade, regiment or company, and finally, the exact whereabouts of each man. You can see whether an individual has been absent or present, sick or well, on duty or off duty—in fine, how he has been, where he has been, and what he has been doing. The system descends to the utmost minutiae, and yet exhibits the condition of the Army in the most comprehensive form. With his maps of the country before him, the Commanding general arranges the manner in which the lines are to be occupied, determines what posts are to be defended, how they are to be situated, and with what force they are to be garrisoned, where the infantry is to be used, and where the dragoons and rifles are to be sent. These great points being determined by him, the orders pass to the military departments, and from these to the divisions, thence to brigades, thence to the regiments, and so down to the companies. Every man hears the command from Washington. Here is the responsibility for the plan, that for the execution may rest elsewhere. The distribution of the troops being fixed, the Commissary General has the simple duty of procuring the rations—certain supplies fixed by law as to quantity and kind, and only liable to be changed by an order of the President. These are to be transported by the order and under the supervision of the Quartermaster General, who, besides, has the furnishing and transportation of other things required by service, as arms, horses, &c., &c. These details prove that the Quartermaster General is not censurable if the supplies are costly in any particular locality, and I should not think less of the Quartermaster General if it cost $100 per barrel to carry the pork ration to a military post. I know he has nothing to do with the matter further than to make an honest contract to have the article transported. The responsibility is all upon the officer who determines the locality of the post—the line to be occupied and to be supplied, and the character of the force to be employed.

When Congress refused the transportation account of the Quartermaster General, at the last session, and reduced the estimates $2,000,000, the essence of that vote was to disapprove of the lines occupied and to suggest, in a legitimate manner, a new disposition and arrangement of the military establishment on the frontiers. It suggested to the President of the United States the propriety of exercising his power to change the rations of the soldier, so as to subsist him from the productions of the country occupied, as far as possible. It suggested to the commander to take his force into the country instead of keeping them in the settlements—to take them to the wood, and not to bring the wood to them. I have cause to believe that a change, and a beneficial change, has occurred in the disposition of the troops, whether in consequence of that vote or not, I shall not pretend to say. The idea of occupying the line of the Rio Grande under the pretence of enforcing the treaty of Hidalgo, is a farce. I once before remarked, that you had not enough men on it to post a relief of sentinels of one to every three miles. But more of this hereafter. I arose for the sole purpose of avowing my readiness to vindicate the correctness of my vote at the last session, and to defend myself against implied censure. I desire gentlemen to understand that I, as one of the majority who reduced the estimates of General Jesup, acted from a sense of my duty to the country—that I shall always be ready to vindicate the correctness of the position then assumed, and that if the remarks made here are want couriers of a deficiency bill designed to bring Congress back to the path of bureau dictation, I shall be quite ready, as a member, to express my views of the new duties we shall owe to ourselves, our dignity, and our country, upon the happening of that event.

With regard to the particular resolution under consideration, I will make a few remarks before I resume my seat. I cannot support the resolution—not that I deny the power of Congress to indicate by legislation where military posts shall be established, and, if the Congress chooses, how the military operations shall be conducted. I distinctly concede, as I maintain, the existence of this power. The Executive is the Commander-in-Chief, and so long as the Army is maintained he has the right to command it; but the Congress has the right to say where it shall be employed when Congress thinks proper to exert such power. But, the question here is not one of power: it is one of expediency. The honorable Delegate from Oregon [Mr. LANE] will find by reference to the debates of the Thirty-first Congress, that his predecessor indicated upon this floor, that the mounted rifle corps was not wanted in Oregon, and that the people of that country were entirely competent to their own defence. I think he made the same assertions to many in our private conversations with him. Now, conceding the claim of the honorable Delegate to the service of the mounted rifles in Oregon, surely the same practice which the Polk administration pursued, to wit: that of sending that regiment where the emergencies of the service required it, would be equally proper under this Administration. That regiment was sent first to Mexico. When that war concluded, a portion of it was sent to Oregon. The former Delegate from Oregon said those troops were not needed in Oregon. Texas required troops to guard her frontier against Indian marauding parties and hostile bands. I suppose it was to meet this emergency, and because of Mr. Thurston's representations, that the rifle regiment was withdrawn from Oregon and sent to the Texas frontier.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman from Kentucky will permit, I will say that, according to my recollection, the Delegate from Oregon to the last Congress said, in substance, that they did not want troops in the actual settlements, but they did desire them on the routes from the States to Oregon. I think there is a distinction. I do not understand the present Delegate from Oregon as requiring troops in the settlements of that Territory.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have not referred to the debates of that session, and shall not be particular as to the exact statement of the former Delegate from Oregon; but, I have conversed with members of the last Congress as to the statement then made, and their recollection as to its purport and substance, concurs with mine. The impression produced upon our minds was, that, from some cause, the troops then in Oregon were not required there. And I suggest that, in the action of the former Delegate will be found the reason of their withdrawal by the Commanding General. Be that as it may, are we prepared, with the limited information we now possess—without any communication with the War Department—without knowledge of the present employment of the rifle regiment or of the necessities of the frontier to which that corps has been ordered—under all the circumstances, are we prepared, absolutely to order the Secretary of War to recall these troops from their present position, and to post them as indicated by this resolution? I take it, that it is very unusual for the House of Representatives to say that particular corps of the Army shall be posted in this position or in that position. But, even admitting that we might so direct, I am not ready to vote that resolution. It not only proposes to order the regiment to Oregon, but to post it in various detachments, in particular sections of that country, after it shall have arrived there. We are asked, not only to direct the Commanding General, but to order the General of Division and the head of the regiment. I am not sufficiently informed as to the urgent necessity for this procedure to vote for it.

I do not know the exact condition of the localities and of the settlements in Oregon sufficiently well to undertake this absolute and peremptory order. While I may have confidence in the military sagacity of the Delegate from Oregon, I yet feel that something of etiquette is due to the person who conducts the military affairs of the country, and that we ought not, upon the sole representations of the honorable Delegate as to his views of the necessities of Oregon, to instruct the Secretary to dispatch the rifle corps thither, regardless of the Secretary's views of the necessities of other sections of the country. Much less, then, can I consent, after the troops shall arrive in Oregon, to direct that detachments shall be posted at this point or at that point. That would be a direct reflection upon the capacity of the Commanding Officer to dispose the troops properly for the defence of the Territory.

We might indicate by bill that military posts shall be established at the points indicated, or to cover certain roads, or to protect certain valleys; but we should leave the kind of force, and the amount of force which will occupy these posts, to the direction of the officer who has the management of that frontier, under his responsibility to the Commanding General. I am disposed—indeed, I am anxious—as far as lies in my power, to extend all necessary protection to our infant settlements on the Pacific, both north and south. I am anxious to render the path of the emigrant secure, and to make him feel that the solicitude of this Government for his welfare follows him by night and by day, through all his arduous journey to his distant home. I am unwilling, however, in the gratification of this proper desire, to assume the responsibility of so controlling the War Department and the Commanding General of the Army as to interfere with existing arrangements for the defence of other parts of the Republic; for in relieving the supposed necessities of Oregon, or in supplying the security which the Oregon emigrant requires, I may justly incur the responsibility of leaving another frontier exposed to the tomahawk of the savage, and call down upon my own head the obligation to answer for the unnumbered misfortunes that shall overtake other unprotected and defenceless settlements.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not propose to detain the House many moments, but really the doctrine advanced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] yesterday, was so strange, so novel, and so important, that I do feel it ought not to pass unnoticed. It was no more nor less than this: that the President of the United States has the right, under all circumstances, to control and dispose of the military and naval forces of the country, uncontrolled by the legislative power. If that doctrine was to be carried out, it would result in precisely this: Congress has the right to declare war; it may raise troops for the purpose of carrying on that war; and yet the Executive would have a right to withhold those troops from the destination and purpose for which Congress intended them, and thus neutralise the power which Congress has to declare war, expressly given to it by the Constitution. If this rifle regiment was raised expressly for the Oregon service, and if the Congress of the United States cannot control it so far as to compel those troops to be applied to that service, why the same power which would authorize the Executive to control that one regiment, would enable him to control the Army and Navy in a case where actual war existed by the action of Congress. The clause of the Constitution to which the gentleman from Virginia refers, simply authorizes the President of the United States to take command of the Army and Navy. What does that mean? It does precisely what is done when you give him executive power in civil matters; it makes him the executive officer to carry out and do the will of Congress—the legislative power of the country. You pass a civil law and it is the duty of the President to carry out and execute that law. You declare war against another nation and raise troops expressly for that war. What has the Executive to do then? Can he withhold these troops from that service? Can he say that instead of sending them against that nation, they shall be sent elsewhere? No, sir. All he has to do is to take charge of the Army and Navy designed for that service, and exercise his executive functions to carry out the will of the Legislature.

Mr. MEACHAM. I would ask the gentleman if President Polk did not frequently remove portions of the Army without the authority of Congress?

Mr. DUNHAM. Why, that question is certainly as novel as the doctrine asserted by the gentleman from Virginia. If President Polk ever ordered the Army in a particular direction, without the authority of Congress, does that militate against the doctrine which I lay down? We declared war against Mexico, and raised troops for that express purpose, and by the Constitution, under the doctrine I am laying down, the President took charge of the Army, in order to carry out the will of the Legislature.

Mr. MEACHAM. The gentleman's answer does not cover my question. I ask him, if President Polk did not frequently remove portions of the Army, without the authority of Congress, before war was declared against Mexico?

Mr. DUNHAM. Even suppose I admit that, did he do it in cases where it was expressly provided by law that the troops should be otherwise situated? He frequently, no doubt, changed the position of our troops, but they were not troops raised and destined by the Legislature for a particular service. This question has never been raised, and I assure this House that it is, in my opinion, one of the most important questions that has been raised here for many a day, and I think it ought to be correctly settled.

I do not understand that the law makes it positively obligatory on the President to place this regiment in the Oregon service; but that it was the intention of Congress that it should be so employed is clearly inferable from the act itself, and from the circumstances under which that act was passed, under which the regiment was organized under it, and so everybody has understood it. Something has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] about "indelicacy." Now, if there is indelicacy anywhere, it seems to me that it is on the part of the Executive, in taking this regiment from the Oregon service, for which it was clearly the intention of Congress that it should be applied. Although the law may not positively direct that it shall be so employed, it was raised for that service, and the Executive has diverted it from that position for which Congress intended it. The gentleman asks if such a thing has not been done before? Yes; but that was in a time of emergency, when we were engaged in war, which changed the state of things.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. But suppose another emergency should arise which should again require the troops to be withdrawn?

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not consider that a case in point. There can no emergency arise which would justify the withdrawal of the troops from any portion of the country, so as to leave it entirely unprotected and exposed as would be the frontier of Oregon. Now, can the gentleman tell me what propriety there was in taking that force from the point for which it was raised, and to transfer it to another for which it was not raised, and thus leave the country for whose protection it was created, entirely unprotected?

Mr. MARSHALL (interrupting) made a remark which was totally inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. DUNHAM, (resuming.) I did not intend to discuss the propriety of taking the troops there. My object was simply to enter my protest against the doctrine that the Congress of the United States has not the right to direct how the troops of the United States shall be employed. The suggestion has been made to me, and I think with a good deal of force, in relation to the other side of the House. I allude to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS]; and I beg to ask that gentleman whether, in the time of the Mexican war, his side of the House, or at least some members on that side, did not undertake the control of the Army in Mexico, and direct the withdrawal of it?

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman from Indiana will allow me, I did not hear him when he first alluded to me, or I should have answered immediately. I did not lay down the doctrine that the legislative power of the country could not control the direction of the Army. The position which is assumed in the resolution, and to which I said I was opposed, was, that the House of Representatives, in itself, had the right to control the direction of the Army. Now I say that this position is not correct. The two Houses of Congress cannot control it, but the legislative power of the country may. It not only requires the assent of both Houses, but it must have the approval of the Executive before that control can be had.

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, sir; that is about as singular as the position taken by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.] Nobody pretends that the House of Representatives, of itself, can control the disposition of the troops of the United States. We do not ask any such thing.

Mr. BROOKS. Why, that is the very object and effect of the resolution.

Mr. DUNHAM. Not as I understand it.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman from Indiana entirely misconceives the scope of my remarks. In a speech of a few minutes in length, I certainly did not intend to define all the limitations and the precise extent of the respective authorities of Congress and of the Executive over our military forces. All that I said yesterday was precisely what the gentleman admits to-day. I did not only take the ground which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] takes, that one branch of Congress cannot take the command of the Army, but I said that both branches could not do it. I denied that Congress had any such power, and that is all that I deny. I never mentioned that Congress could not establish military posts. I never maintained that Congress could not prescribe the character of those forces—whether they should be cavalry, riflemen, infantry, or anything else. I meant to say that when we had raised an army, and provided for the support of that army, it then belongs to the Commander-in-Chief to say whether it shall be posted here or there. It cannot belong to Congress, unless Congress is Commander-in-Chief of the Army.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is the very position which I occupy, as I understand the gentleman's explanation. I undertake to say, that Congress have the right to raise troops for a particular purpose, and to give them that particular direction, and then nothing remains for the Commander-in-Chief but to take charge of those troops in that direction and to apply them to that purpose. He may give direction to the troops in detail—if I may use the expression—in carrying out the law of Congress. Let us look at this matter. In the time of the Seminole war, for instance, does any gentleman undertake to say that Congress had not the right to raise a corps for that service, or that the Executive had the right to dispose of that corps in any way other than for the prosecution of that war? All that the Executive had to do was to take charge of those troops and control them for that purpose. I apprehend that no one will contend that the Executive had the right to give those troops any other direction. That is my doctrine. If I am correct in that case, then I ask, if the Executive has any more right, when Congress has raised a regiment of mounted riflemen for the purpose of stationing them on the routes to Oregon, to divert them from that particular service? I think not. The law which created this regiment, created it for a particular purpose, and the President had nothing to do but to dispose of the troops according to that law.

But I was going on to reply to the gentleman from New York. I do not understand this resolution to be a resolution directing the President how to dispose of these troops in any particular way. I do not apprehend that the House have that power. But as the Representatives of the people, they have the right to request him to make this or that disposition of the power intrusted in his hands. I think that can be done, either by the people or the people's Representatives, and I trust the time will not pass away when we shall not have that right.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think this discussion has gone far enough.

Mr. EVANS. It has been all on one side though.

Mr. JONES. Whatever may be the power of Congress in relation to this matter, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] that this House has no right to give this direction. I move the previous question.

Mr. EVANS. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say something in relation to this matter. The question has yet been discussed only on one side.

Mr. LANE. As the mover of this resolution, I ask whether I have not the right to reply if the previous question is seconded?

The SPEAKER. That can only be done when the resolution is introduced from a committee.

Mr. JONES. I decline to withdraw the call for the previous question.

The question then being upon seconding the call for the previous question,

Mr. JONES demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. KING, of New York, and WILLIAMS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 79.

So the House refused to second the call for the previous question.

Mr. EVANS. I thank the House for its courtesy in having voted down the motion for the previous question—a motion brought forward and urged here, after a long debate, which was carried on almost altogether on one side of the question—only one single gentleman having spoken in defence of the administration of the War Department of the Government. The Democrats of the House have in this instance shown an impartiality for which I thank them, for without their assistance the call for the previous question could not have been voted down.

I cannot but feel my deficiency in ability to discuss this question as it ought to be discussed. I know very well that I cannot compensate the House for the kindness and indulgence which they have shown me, but I do intend to give them some little information in regard to this question. I promise to open, at least, one or two sources of information which have not been touched upon by other gentlemen at all. I do not hesitate to say that there has been no assumption of power, in ordering the withdrawal of those troops from Oregon. Such assumption has been taken for granted by every gentleman who has hitherto addressed the House upon this question. It has been taken for granted that this regiment was ordered by law to be stationed in Oregon, and not to be withdrawn. But though it has been taken for granted that they were ordered by the law which created that regiment, to be stationed in Oregon, or on the route to Oregon, I say that there is no such thing in the law or the title at all.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that I said expressly that that law ordered the regiment to be stationed on the route to Oregon. I did not say that; I said that from the title of the law it was evident that such was its intention, although the law itself does not expressly say so.

Mr. EVANS. Well, I deny that.

Mr. GORMAN. That is precisely the position, that from the title of the bill it was evident that it was the intention, in making the law, that the troops should be stationed in Oregon.

Mr. EVANS. I deny that. I say that there is no such thing in the bill, or the title, or the preamble, or anywhere else. But I also deny another proposition, which has been presented here with great vehemence and urged with great force—if vehemence is force—that the Secretary of War is bound to come here and look into the character of our debates in this House, in order to ascertain what the acts mean. I dare say that some of the acts would require such a research, in order to make them intelligible, but it is a singular state of affairs if the debates of a legislative body are to be investigated in order to ascertain what the legislative act is. Now let us recur to the facts of the case, and see whether the construction which the gentleman puts upon the law is the correct one. I will commence with the title, but before I am through I shall have the whole act read. It is entitled "An act to provide for raising a regiment of mounted riflemen." That is the first part of it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, read the last part of it.

Mr. EVANS. I will read the last part, and the whole act too, after a while.

Mr. DUNHAM. I only want the title. Let us have the last of it.

Mr. EVANS. The last part of it is: "and for establishing military stations on the route to Oregon." And does that bind the Secretary of War to station those mounted riflemen in Oregon, or on the route to Oregon? How could mounted troops alone garrison a fort? I will explain the true cause for raising this regiment. It was gotten up at the time or shortly after our difficulties with Great Britain, and the excitement which was caused in consequence of those difficulties was the cause of its passing through the House. But there is nothing in the law which instructs the Secretary of War to station that regiment on the route to Oregon, or in Oregon. There is not a particle of evidence that such was its intention.

I say there is nothing in the law compelling him to station and maintain that regiment in Oregon. But suppose there was: I assert in my place, that they were withdrawn from the Territory of Oregon by the request of the then Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. Thurston,] and that they were withdrawn from the Territory of California by the advice of distinguished gentlemen then, and some of them now, in power, residing in that State. I was on the Committee on Military Affairs during the last Congress, and the representative from Oregon [Mr. Thurston] frequently appeared before it, and he has told me repeatedly, and again and again—and there are gentlemen sitting about me whom I might call upon to corroborate my statement if it were necessary—that the people of Oregon did not want one of them in Oregon, and that they could defend themselves, if we would furnish the money. It is in the recollection of gentlemen upon this floor, that at the last session of Congress we gave to Oregon $100,000 in cash for the purpose of paying their expenses in this Cayuse war. That is the state of facts. What is it now? The Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE]—a highly-respected gentleman, and with whom this country is very well acquainted, a man, no doubt, well versed in military affairs, and from whose brow, were it in my power, I would not pluck one laurel—that gentleman comes forward and states, that in order to protect the people on the route to Oregon, a certain course on the part of the Administration is necessary, and that the War Department must act in a certain way, and start troops upon certain routes.

Now, his predecessor, who was listened to, and whose voice was heard, advised directly to the contrary. Such was his advice; and so he stated directly, and I am prepared to prove it—I know, unfortunately, that he is dead, and I have therefore a reluctance in bringing in his name; I had the happiness during his life of an opportunity of showing him some acts of kindness, and I feel disinclined to drag his name into debate—he stated expressly to the War Department, that mounted rifles were not suited to the Oregon Territory; that it was an irregular and mountainous country; that it was impossible to pursue the Indians on horseback; and that infantry ought to be substituted. Such were his declarations; and in accordance with the advice of a distinguished member of the Democratic party, and of the advice of the then Delegate, who was intimately acquainted with the character of the population, and had traveled extensively over the country, infantry was proposed to be substituted for mounted troops.

Mr. LANE. If the gentleman will allow me, for I hate to see the gentleman go too far wrong, I wish to say the gentleman has come to wrong conclusions upon two or three points. It may be true, and I do not doubt it, that the first Delegate from Oregon advised the removal of the mounted regiment from that country; but it is not true that he resided a long time in that Territory. He arrived there late in the fall of 1847, and was elected in the spring of 1849 to the Congress of the United States, and immediately left for this city. He had never traveled outside of the settlements, nor had he seen but a very small portion of that Territory. Another thing has been stated, that $100,000 has been given to Oregon in consideration of the removal of the troops from Oregon, to enable them to defend themselves.

Mr. EVANS. No, sir. I did not state that. I stated that $100,000 was voted by Congress to the Territory of Oregon to pay the expenses of the war against the Cayuse Indians. That is what I stated. If the gentleman denies it, I will produce the records.

Mr. LANE. That is true.

Mr. EVANS. Now I want the Delegate from Oregon to tell me how long he has been in Oregon. I recollect, since I came to Congress, that he was a distinguished officer in the Mexican war.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Thurston arrived in Oregon in September or October, 1847, and left for Washington city in 1849. I arrived there in 1848, and remained until 1851.

Mr. EVANS. I do not think it a matter at all material. I took it for granted that the gentleman was acquainted with the state of this Territory. At any rate, he knew it better than any one else. He was then a representative upon this floor. I am sure he pretended to an acquaintance with it; he showed a great deal of information about it; and as I was a little curious about the country, I asked a great many questions, which he answered intelligently. He issued a circular to the whole country, informing the people about the geography and topography of Oregon, as inducements to emigrate there.

Well, sir, upon the representations of that gentleman, that mounted troops were unfit for that Territory, infantry were proposed to be substituted in their place, and the Secretary of War is now assailed for doing it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] says it was a most unheard-of proposition. The Secretary of War followed the best lights he had, and he cannot be blamed for it.

Now I will state another matter, in reference to this Oregon regiment. Gentlemen take it for granted that in the bill for raising that regiment, it provided that the regiment should be posted in Oregon. I say there is no such provision. But granting that it is there, this regiment was raised in 1846. Now I assert that this regiment, as a regiment, had never been in Oregon. A portion of it had been there. It had been sent there by no previous Administration, either Mr. Polk's, General Taylor's, or Mr. Fillmore's, down to this time. And if it was a crime to take them away, it was equally as great a fault not to have sent them all there. I do not think the gentleman from Oregon will state that the regiment has been there at any period whatever. Now, by the resolution does the gentleman want these troops sent to Oregon? Oh, no. Not at all; but on the road to Oregon. He does not want to carry out the original obligations of the law, and preserve that high faith which we are bound to observe, in carrying out the laws of the United States. He does not pretend to observe it himself; he wants merely that the troops shall be stationed upon the route. Now what is the state of facts in regard to that route? The War Department has troops already upon a portion of it, for the protection of emigrants going there. And it is the intention to station dragoons along that route, in the summer time, who shall pass up and down along it, to give assistance and protection to emigrants upon it.

But the main reason why the troops could not be continued in Oregon is, that you refused the necessary appropriations to the Quartermaster's department—the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] to the contrary notwithstanding. Last year we had a debate upon the Quartermaster's department. I do not propose to vindicate that department now. That will be more appropriate hereafter. I do not propose to vindicate its expenses, or say whether they are too little or too great. But I do say that the increased expenses of that department entirely arise out of the possessions we have obtained upon the Pacific coast; out of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which you are under a solemn pledge to observe. That treaty was made under a Democratic Administration—by Mr. Polk. By that treaty we bound ourselves to protect the frontiers of Mexico from the incursions of the Indians, who shall come there for the purpose of attacks upon its inhabitants. Have we observed its stipulations in good faith? Does not every gentleman know that Mexico has claims against us for millions of dollars on account of our neglect of its provisions? Does not every gentleman know, as well as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] himself, that the most warlike Indians to be found anywhere in the territory of the United States are in Texas?

Mr. GORMAN, (interrupting.) I would like to have the gentleman answer this question: What has the Secretary of War done with the first, second, and third dragoons?

Mr. EVANS. I will answer, that I do not know what he has done with them; but as soon as the question arises, I will find out. I am going to stick to the question now up—the resolution of the gentleman from Oregon—and we will attend to the dragoons afterwards. I was speaking of our obligations under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. I have always found this House of Representatives particularly skillful in stationing troops, and afterwards particularly skillful in shirking the bills. Now, sir, more warlike and merciless Indians are not to be found in the territory of the United States, than those upon the borders of Texas and New Mexico—Indians who do not shrink from an encounter with the Anglo-Saxon race. We are bound by a solemn treaty stipulation to keep them from aggressions upon Mexico; and it was stated in this House, upon the debate relative to the Quartermaster's department during the last Congress, that these mounted rifles were withdrawn for the purpose of sending them to Texas, in order, as numerous gentlemen said, and myself among the number, to lessen the expenses of the Quartermasters's department. It was necessary that they should be there; and we were told that they were of no use in Oregon and California, and that infantry could serve a much better purpose there. They were, therefore, withdrawn and brought into the territory of Texas, for the purpose of carrying out our obligations under the treaty with Mexico, as well as for the purpose of protecting the people of Texas from Indian devastation.

I was under the impression that Mr. Polk had withdrawn these troops, but I was mistaken as to the mounted riflemen. I will undertake to show, however, that Mr. Polk did withdraw troops from the line between the western frontiers and Oregon.

I want gentlemen to tell me how the Secretary of War is to carry troops into Oregon, California, and along the immense line of the Gila to the Pacific ocean, and between the Missouri and the Rocky Mountains, with the number of men now in the Army, and with the small means of transportation and subsistence at his disposal? It is impossible. It is in vain that you endeavor to shirk the responsibility upon us. It is the duty of every upright and candid legislator, at once to assume the responsibility that belongs to his position. If the acquirement of new territory brings upon us expenses which we have not before had, the legislator knows it is his duty to acknowledge the source from which they arise, and to pay them. The gentleman from Ohio, over the way, [Mr. CARTER,] made a sweeping statement of the extravagant desire of the Quartermaster, to swallow down the public money in his insatiable maw. But he did not descend to items; and I always observe that when gentleman cannot descend to the items, they are apt to know very little about the subject. If this gentleman is anxious to know where this expenditure of $50,000,000 goes to, I will read him a few items for his satisfaction, and point out to him the place from which he can derive new light and information.

The gentleman left the House to the belief that this fifty millions was alone applicable to the Army; and what are the facts? Well, I will give some of the extras in the Army that have sprung out of the acquisition of the new territories. Every candid man is aware that they have grown out of our territorial acquisitions. They will be found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the Second session of the Thirty-first Congress, viz:

By deducting this aggregate of excess of...$23,199,148 64 from the aggregate estimated expenditures for the year ending 30th June, 1852, of $48,124,993 18, there will remain as the estimated ordinary expenditures, the sum of $24,925,844 54.

Thus it will be seen that of the aggregate expenditures, actual and estimated, for the seven years ending on the 30th June, 1852, amounting to $294,807,407 95, the sum of $138,148,330 16, exclusive of $13,387,544 06, interest on the war debt, is required to sustain the faith of the Government, pledged or implied, or arising in consequence of its acts during a period subsequent to 30th June, 1845, and prior to 1st July, 1849. Some of the objects of these estimated expenditures, by reason of the extended area of territory, have been made either permanent charges upon the Treasury or will continue for a long series of years, and may be stated as follows:

Excess of expenditures of War Department, pensions, interest on war debt, territorial governments, survey of boundary line, survey of coast of California, Indians, judiciary, &c.

Further experience will undoubtedly result in compelling still greater expenditures in the fulfillment of treaty stipulations, and in controlling and subduing the Indians and other lawless bands with which our newly acquired territories are infested, and before there will be that permanent emigration to and settlement therein of that class of our citizens so necessary to a full development of the resources and defence of that country.

Mr. DISNEY. I am very sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Maryland, but I rise simply to say to the House that I apprehend this debate will amount practically to nothing. I had a personal interview with the Secretary of War a few moments since, and he stated to me that it was his intention to station mounted men upon the roads to Oregon. At my suggestion the Delegate from Oregon had also an interview with the Secretary, and he is entirely satisfied, and this whole matter can be accomplished without the intervention of the House.

Mr. EVANS. I am sure when I give the gentleman the courtesy of the floor, that he ought not to ask me to stop speaking. [Laughter.] That is not quite fair.

Mr. DISNEY. I was going to add, that in a very short time we will have up the deficiency bills, and then my friend from Maryland will have ample opportunity to debate this subject.

Mr. EVANS. I feel indeed confident that I have not succeeded in making this subject very agreeable to the House. But I have almost got through what I have to say. And since members have listened to me with so much kind indulgence and so much patient attention, I scarcely feel myself justified in speaking again on it as the gentleman suggests, for I should, I can assure the House, then begin all over again; besides, I think it necessary to vindicate the Secretary of War, who has here been assailed upon this very occasion. I think, then, that as the House has borne that part of the infliction which I have already given it, members had better take the balance now, and not have it in divided portions.

Several MEMBERS. "Go on!" "Go on!"

Mr. EVANS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not quote these figures at this time for the purpose of casting censure upon any political party; but in order to vindicate the truth of history, to show out of what large expenditures have arisen, to give the true authors of them, and to let praise and blame light where they severally belong.

If I have succeeded in showing, as I believe every reasonable, candid gentleman will admit I have shown, that your largely-increased governmental expenses have sprung out of the Mexican war, and out of our foreign acquisitions, I shall permit other gentlemen to quote the vast mineral resources of California, her importance in connection with the trade of the East, which is about to pour its golden rewards into her lap; and further, to dwell upon the military and civil, the agricultural and commercial importance of that Territory, if it please members to take up such a line of argument. I am not arraigning them for any unfair or partisan purpose, but the reason is, that I wish to show gentlemen who talk about millions, and charge by implication the whole of it to the Army, that there is a way for persons sufficiently industrious to discover where it comes from. It is all here in this report. I will merely now refer members to this little book, and when they get home they can send for it to the document room. It is very amusing, particularly the figure part. Members can reflect upon the matter in their hours of private meditation; and we all know that members take a particular pleasure in studying political arithmetic.

A MEMBER. What is the title of the document?

Mr. EVANS. It is Executive document No. 11, Second Session Thirty-first Congress.

Mr. FULLER. What is the page?

Mr. EVANS. Pages seven and eight. It contains a most formidable array of figures. Now, sir, the expenses of the Quartermaster's department of the Army has necessarily increased from one single fact. I do not propose to enter upon the question as to whether they have increased too much; nor can I see how it can be well done without striking a blow at the public reputation and private credit at the able head of that department. It may be done by admitting his inefficiency, or his dishonesty. One of these causes must be taken, and I do not therefore propose entering into the merits of it. Gentlemen will bear in mind that previous to the acquisition of our new territory—and there are gentlemen in this House of sufficient ability to correct me if I am wrong—we had not a post that could not be reached by steamboat navigation. The troops of the United States are now withdrawn from these posts of easy access in the north and east, the northwest and southwest and have been removed to the far frontiers of the country—stationed in Texas, in New Mexico, in California, and in Oregon, where provisions can be obtained only with difficulty. I remember having seen, at the last session of Congress, a document sent to us from the Territory of Oregon. I do not know whether it came from the honorable Delegate from that Territory or not. At any rate it came from a reliable source there, giving the price of articles of food for man and beast, and they were the most extravagant I ever heard of. These were part of the expenses to be borne by the Quartermaster. Before we go into an entire denunciation of this gentleman at the other end of the avenue connected with that Department, and who has no good reason for plundering the Government, let us have the candor to look into the details of their expenses. Let us investigate them. Let us see how much more is required of the Quartermaster for the transportation to particular posts than was required before the existence of this war, and the acquisition of our new territories. Whenever that is found out, my word for it that Department will be fully vindicated and justified. Look at the course of the last Congress. I will here refer to the Congressional Globe, for a single moment. I am sorry the able and eloquent gentleman, [Mr. TOOMBS,] whose remarks I am about to quote, is not here.

I read from the Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-first Congress, pages 731, 732.

"The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYCE] had said he [Mr. TOOMBS] struck in the dark. He desired to know upon what authority he had made that assertion.

"Mr. BRYCE said he had quoted the gentleman's own language.

"Mr. TOOMBS said, if he had struck in the dark it was the fault of those who possessed the necessary information for making a proper discrimination in the items to be cut down and would not furnish them."

That is Mr. TOOMBS's vindication for striking in the dark; and the fact that the Committee of Ways and Means of this House having struck in the dark is not, I believe, denied. They did not act upon any ascertained facts in cutting down the expenses of the Quartermaster's department, but from a general disposition to do it. It was done without one single gentleman in this House having sufficient information, by their own acknowledgment to tell to what extent it should be done. My honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who knows as much about military matters as any other gentleman upon this floor, (and I wish I knew as much,) voted against the appropriation to the Quartermaster's department. So far as I can discover in this Congressional Globe, he never explained to this House why they ought to be cut down, where they ought to be cut down, or upon what account, but he struck in the dark.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman has not displayed his usual industry in ransacking the Congressional Globe, or he would have found that I gave my reasons for my vote at the time it was given, and I did not go through the items which made up the $5,000,000, of the Quartermaster's accounts. My not attempting to investigate the items was very reasonable, when gentlemen of the Military Committee announced to the House that they had tried to obtain them, but had failed.

Mr. EVANS. I will now quote some remarks of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress. And I read from the Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-first Congress, page 734. Mr. BAYLY states:

"In relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCLANE] I may say, sir, that this matter of mounted infantry has proved a dead failure. The sending of these mounted rifles, and other mounted infantry forces, to Oregon and California, has been in the main the cause of this great expenditure, and of which there has justly been so much complaint made in this House. It is these things which the present head of the War Department is trying (as I showed this morning) to correct."

Thus it appears from the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] that one of the main causes of the increased expenditure in the Quartermaster's department has been the sending of these very riflemen to Oregon and California. The gentlemen that denounce the expenditure insist upon a repetition of the cause of the expense. They want that restored which led to the expenditure, but they denounce the extravagance and shirk the payment of the money. Such a course may strike some gentlemen as a fair one, but it does not present itself in that attitude to my mind. I will return. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House much longer.

Mr. GORMAN. The Secretary of War states in his report, as one of the causes for the extraordinary expenditure in the Quartermaster's department, that there have been great frauds committed, that there has been great extravagance, recklessness, and want of economy in that department. He says:

"It is probable, however, that, in some instances, the expenditures, both of the Quartermaster and Commissary departments, may have been increased by maladministration. The transactions of both these departments involve such a variety of details, and their agents are so far removed from the supervision of their chiefs, that abuses may exist a long time before they are discovered. Every effort, however, has been used to detect these abuses and to prevent their recurrence. Inspectors have been sent to the frontiers to inquire into the manner in which the affairs of these departments are administered, and a rigid scrutiny into accounts has been ordered. I regret to say that the Department has some reason to fear that its apprehensions on this subject were not altogether without foundation."

Mr. EVANS. I am perfectly willing that what the gentleman has quoted shall be inserted in my speech. It is impossible for us to evade the responsibility of our position. We have to defend these people. The people of Oregon, New Mexico, and California must be defended, and we must observe the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and prevent these predatory Indians from making incursions into the Republic of Mexico. It is our bounden duty, and it should be our pride, to maintain good faith with all nations. But we must not seek to make the defence, and at the same time to get rid of the expenditure. I will return a single moment to the subject of the raising of these mounted riflemen. I want thoroughly to vindicate the Secretary of War in this matter. And I now assert, that this regiment never was in Oregon as a regiment; portions of it were in California from the beginning. If, then, the Secretary violated his duty and disobeyed the dictates of the law in withdrawing the portion stationed in Oregon, what is to be thought of the conduct of those who were in power when the act passed, knew the intentions of Congress upon the subject, and yet failed to send the regiment to its intended destination? But I shall show that the Secretary is not to be blamed for the withdrawal of the troops, for he was induced to withdraw them on the representations of the Delegate from Oregon himself. In the debates upon this floor, in the last Congress, it was stated that these troops were unnecessary in Oregon and California. I wish to vindicate the Secretary of War. I will go further, and promise to vindicate him to the full satisfaction of the House. I do not want to do it by way of sophistical argument. I might thus, perhaps, impose upon those who did not pay strict attention to the fallacious reasoning, but I will vindicate him by letting every gentleman see the facts. I will make the act itself for the raising the regiment of mounted riflemen, vindicate the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War, I venture to assert, cannot find out from the act that a mounted regiment is to be raised and stationed in Oregon. I venture to say that the act has been altogether misconceived. But some gentlemen thought the Secretary should have consulted the Congressional Globe. I will ask if any gentleman is bound to ransack the Congressional debates to ascertain what is meant by any act of Congress? The act should interpret itself. Do the courts of justice make examinations of the Congressional Globe in order to find out the meaning of ambiguous statutes? Does any gentleman quote the debates in the Supreme Court of the United States—or in the circuit or district courts of the United States? No, sir. The debates have been quoted only on the stump, before the people. That is the place for them—before those who make the makers of the laws, and not before those who administer the laws.

Having stated thus much by preface, I come to the act. The title of the act is,

"An Act to provide for raising a regiment of mounted riflemen, and for establishing military stations on the route to Oregon."

Now, here are two distinct parts to this title, as there are two distinct parts to the body of the act itself, as I shall show presently. It was necessary that there should be two such parts, in order properly to characterize the contents of the bill; but there is no necessary connection between them: the same bill might have contained provisions for riflemen for Maine, or Texas, or anywhere, and the other for "Military stations on the route to Oregon." Such might have been the intention of Congress; and if our bills are to be interpreted upon such a principle as this, we shall have some strange adjudications with regard to many of them: for the most incongruous, or only seemingly corgruous provisions, upon quite independent subjects, exist in the most of them. A bill passed the Legislature of Pennsylvania providing for the appointment of a justice of the peace, and there was also put into it, without the knowledge of the Legislature, a bill for a railroad, but I never heard it contended that the justice of the peace was to build it.

Now, this act does not provide that these troops must be sent to Oregon. If so, how long are they to remain there? I ask gentlemen, when are they to be withdrawn—within a century? Or is it to be when the act is repealed? If the act states simply that they shall go there, it must be left to the sound discretion of the President of the United States to say when they shall be withdrawn. Congress could not have the information to declare when the longer retention of troops at a post was unnecessary, and they might do fatal injury to a frontier people, by withdrawing them at an improper time, thus exposing them to the cruelties and barbarities of the Indians.

I will now proceed to fulfill my promise, given in the beginning of this debate, to quote the whole act, and to show that there is nowhere in it any command to the Secretary to station these mounted rifles in Oregon, or to continue them there. The act is as follows:

AN ACT to provide for raising a regiment of mounted riflemen, and for establishing military stations on the route to Oregon.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be raised one regiment of mounted riflemen, to be composed and organized as follows, to wit: One colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, one quartermaster sergeant, and two chief buglers, one adjutant, who shall be a lieutenant, one sergeant major, one chief musician, and ten companies: each company shall consist of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, (exclusive of the adjutant lieutenant), four sergeants, four corporals, two buglers, one farrier, one blacksmith, and sixty-four privates.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates shall be entitled to the same pay and emoluments as are allowed to dragoons, and that the farrier and blacksmith shall receive the same pay and allowances as are allowed to an artificer of artillery.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said regiment of riflemen shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be recruited in the same manner as other troops in the service of the United States, and with the same conditions and limitations; and the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, blacksmiths, and farriers shall be entitled to the same provisions for wounds and disabilities, and the same provisions for widows and children, and the same allowances and benefits, in every respect, as are allowed to other troops composing the Army of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of said regiment, when employed in constructing fortifications, making surveys, cutting roads, or performing other labor, shall be allowed fifteen cents per day each, with a commutation in money for the extra spirit ration, as provided by the act of the second of March, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the army when on fatigue duty."

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of seventy-six thousand five hundred dollars, for mounting and equipping said regiment, be, and the same hereby is appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That a sum not exceeding three thousand dollars, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same hereby is appropriated, to defray the expenses of each military station or defence which the President may deem necessary on the line of communication with Oregon, and a sum not exceeding two thousand dollars for making compensation to the Indian tribes which may own or possess the ground on which the said station may be erected, and for each station.

APPROVED, May 13, 1846.

It thus appears that in the whole act, the word "Oregon" appears only in the sixth section, and in the preamble, which is a reference to that section. And what does the sixth section provide? Why, that $3,000 be appropriated to defray the expenses of each military station on the line of communication with Oregon.

Well, such stations have been provided, and I now desire anybody to tell me whereabouts in this section it appears that the mounted rifles are to be sent to Oregon, and not to be withdrawn from that Territory. There is no syllable of such an expression; there is nothing, absolutely nothing in the whole act, preamble and all, to point out to the present Secretary of War that he must not withdraw the mounted troops from Oregon without the consent and direction of Congress. And now I should like any gentleman to show me any part of this act which requires the troops to go to Oregon and not be withdrawn, or which points out definitely or indefinitely any intention of Congress upon the subject. There is not a word from beginning to end, notwithstanding the assault which has been made upon the Secretary of War, that he was derelict to his duty.

I trust that I have justified his course. But we have heard here to-day some very high pretensions and elevated notions with regard to the power of the Executive. Why, when I first came to Congress, it was contended by the party now having a majority in this House, that the President of the United States, as conqueror of a foreign nation, had a right to give laws to the conquered. That was the doctrine when I came here. I am glad that better opinions and principles at least begin to prevail. And now I repeat, that with all the vague declamation which has been poured out upon the Secretary of War, and the President of the United States, for not observing the direction of the Congress upon this subject, an entire misconception has sprung up in regard to it. The act has been misconceived. It does not direct at all what it has been supposed to direct, as any one will find out if he will examine it. If the act did direct troops to be sent to a certain post, there is no question that the President of the United States, in the exercise of a sound discretion, or the Secretary of War had the right to withdraw the troops, if it became necessary so to do. They could not be there forever. And if no such power existed, then an enemy might cut off, or destroy forces so unhappily situated.

Well, the Secretary did withdraw the troops, not being compelled by the act to retain them at that post; and he did it upon the representation of those who were well informed, or who professed to be well informed. Now a word as to the military capacity of the Secretary of War. I believe, since he has been in the administration of that Department, that he has given to it his careful study, and has devoted his time to it; so that he has become exceedingly well acquainted upon all the points connected with military affairs. I believe he has performed his full duty to the Department in this respect; and though I know he is not a military man by profession, that he was an eminent civilian and lawyer, before he came to Washington, having an extensive practice in the State of Louisiana, yet I know he has capacity, as far as the elements of the military art are concerned, and, I believe, he has by industry, by study, and by reflection, fully qualified himself for the post he occupies. What is the assault made upon him? It is, that he had substituted infantry for mounted riflemen; and when you get to the facts, it was by the express request of the former Delegate from Oregon, that the substitution was made. That Delegate came forward and stated, that mounted riflemen were unsuited to the Oregon country, which was an abrupt, broken, and mountainous region—that the Indians could escape with the greatest ease and facility from such a character of force. He stated, that while mounted rifles might be very proper upon the plains of Texas and the great prairies of the West, yet in a country totally different in all its physical configurations, it would be improper to employ that kind of troops; and the Secretary is now assailed for listening to the advice of the Delegate. Suppose the Secretary had said, I know more about Oregon than you do; I shall continue the mounted troops. And suppose he had continued them, and that on account of that continuance massacres had taken place, and innocent people had been driven from their homes for the want of foot soldiers or infantry, who were necessary to their protection. Why what reproaches would have been poured upon his head, and how justly he would have been subjected to the indignation of the whole country!

Mr. LANE. Did the Secretary of War send the infantry there?

Mr. EVANS. I think he did, but I am not now prepared to answer the question.

Mr. LANE. No such thing has been done.

Mr. EVANS. If the gentleman is certain about it, I will give it up at once. It is of no importance to the question under discussion. The Delegate from Oregon [Mr. Thurston] stated, and the gentleman from New York, by my side, heard him, that the people of Oregon did not want any troops there, if the Government would pay them for defending themselves—that they could take care of themselves, if furnished with a title of the money troops would cost. Now, that is a good reason for not sending the infantry, if one is wanted. The Delegate from Oregon, representing that Territory, must be presumed to know what the interests and wishes of the people of that Territory are; and if the Government here, in pursuance of those interests and wishes, followed them out, ought it now to be denounced by the succeeding Delegate from the Territory of Oregon, for having done just what it was requested to do? I think the Administration showed a great willingness to do everything for Oregon. I know the Committee on Military Affairs consulted with the War Department. I also felt myself a profound interest in that country. I consider that the people went there when there was but little to attract them. I felt that they had gone to a Territory, where they could have but a doubtful title to their lands, and where they must live in constant danger of attack from hostile bands of Indians, who were upon their paths everywhere. They had to scale the lofty summits of the Rocky Mountains, covered with eternal snow, and then descend into the valley of the Columbia, and enter a Territory little known, and unfriendly to their occupation. I believe that we have but a feeble conception of the sufferings of many of them. When I was on the Committee of Public Lands in the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, I advocated in committee a bill, by which was given to every settler in Oregon double the amount of land they now receive as a gratuity, and extending the benefits to settlers who should settle in that Territory by the year 1852.

The committee reduced the proposition one half, and the bill passed at the last session of Congress in the form in which it had been presented previously. I only mention this to show that I have uniformly felt a kindness towards the people of that Territory. That kindness was not discontinued when I was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. The last session we brought before the House a bill to pay $100,000 to the people of Oregon for the war with the Cayuse Indians. The Territory was at a remote distance, and we had neither accounts or vouchers before us. But we were still willing to be animated by the same spirit, and I must say that the War Department showed kindness and liberality towards the people of that Territory, and never refused to give them protection. That Department followed the advice of the Delegate from Oregon upon all proper occasions, and listened to him with consideration. Is the Secretary of War to be denounced for such conduct now? Does not the generous heart of every man revolt from the injustice of such a proceeding as that? I trust that I have vindicated sufficiently the course of the Secretary in this matter. There are many other facts to which I might refer. I desire gentlemen, who do not think the Secretary has done exactly right, and who may think I have made mistakes in these remarks, to have an opportunity of replying to what I have here stated. I shall move no previous question. There are characters to defend—there are reputations at stake, and they must be vindicated. If it is necessary to have mounted riflemen in Oregon, my word for it, as an honest man, you must raise them. If you raise them, you must make an appropriation for them. Do you propose to observe the treaty with Mexico? If so, troops may be required, and if troops, then money. But there is one branch of the subject to which I wish to advert for a moment. I have been two or three years upon the Committee on Military Affairs, so that I think I shall not be guilty of great presumption, if I should attempt to say a few words about the posting of these troops in Oregon. It would not be safe, nay it would be presumptuous for the House to undertake to specify the stations and positions of troops. I am speaking of the presumption of the House as a body, and not of any single individual. Why, you might place them in the most unfortunate positions, in which they would meet with certain disaster and overwhelming defeat, or in which they might be unable to get supplies, and therefore the House never has attempted to do anything of the kind.

I have no objection to a resolution calling upon the President for any information, with regard to these mounted rifles. That regiment has now been called home, its horses have been sold in Oregon, and a great many of the soldiers have deserted, and gone to the gold mines of California. The regiment had become a skeleton regiment, and it was found necessary to add new men to it. Those men are now being enlisted, and when enlisted, it is proposed to send that regiment of mounted rifles to Texas. And if you send them to Oregon, you will have to raise another troop for Texas.

In conclusion, I beg leave to return my thanks to the House for the kindness with which they have heard me, and to apologize for having trespassed so long upon their time. My sole object has been to vindicate the Secretary of War, who has acted, I believe, in this whole matter, honestly and fairly, without transcending his duty, and, moreover, with ability and singleness of purpose.

Mr. STUART. I would like to inquire of the Delegate from Oregon, whether he intends to press this vote? Because if he does, I desire to say a few words as to the motives which will govern my action; otherwise I do not intend to say anything.

Mr. LANE. I have just had an interview with the Secretary of War relative to this matter. I should like to have the attention of the House, while I give my views with reference to this rifle regiment and the movement of it, and then I am willing that the vote shall be reconsidered and the resolution laid on the table or withdrawn, for I have the assurance of the Secretary of War, that troops shall be posted upon the route this season in sufficient time to afford protection to the people bound to Oregon.

Mr. STUART. I merely wish to say that my object in rising was to state my views very briefly in regard to the power of this House over this matter, and the power of the Executive of the United States. But learning from the Delegate from Oregon that he has received assurances from the Secretary of War which induce him not to press the question, and being at all times unwilling unnecessarily to consume the time of the House, I will yield the floor to him for the purpose of explanation, and refrain from making any remarks myself.

Mr. LANE. I have not intended at any time to thrust my opinion on military matters upon the House, or to claim anything for the little military service I have seen, and the little experience I have had in the service of my country. I never have said upon any occasion, nor do I mean to say in this House, that my opinions are entitled to respect because I have seen a little service in a war which I did regard, and do yet regard, as a just war and one which every American citizen should have supported with heart and hand. There should have been but one feeling in this country when we were engaged in that war. Unfortunately, however, there were two; but I do hope that if this country shall ever again be involved in war, there will be but one opinion, and that, that it is the duty of every American citizen to take the part of his country, and never to sympathize with her enemies. It would have been well for the opponents of the Mexican war if they had uttered fewer words in opposition to it than some of them did.

Now, sir, out of that war has grown an extension of this country; it has given us an extended frontier which is entitled to protection. Oregon is a large piece of territory aside from the additional extension of our country. It embraces from the summit of the Rocky mountains to the Pacific ocean—a thousand miles in extent in one direction, and from the forty-second to the forty-ninth parallel in the other. In that Territory there are no troops. There are the remnants of two companies of artillery, but an infantry soldier has never been ordered to that Territory.

The rifle regiment was clearly and distinctly raised for that service. President Polk recommended the raising of the regiment to be stationed on the route to Oregon for the protection of emigrants bound for that Territory, and in pursuance of that recommendation, Congress authorized the raising of the regiment. It was raised, but this was unfortunately during the Mexican war, and under the emergency of the occasion had to be sent to Mexico, and there served till the conclusion of that war. When it returned, Mr. Polk very justly thought they were, in common with other new regiments, entitled to a discharge, and so many of them as desired it were discharged. The skeleton remaining was filled up by recruits, as I stated yesterday, on the express condition that they were to be employed in this Oregon service. It was sent to Oregon after being thus filled up, but only suffered to remain there some eighteen months, till about April of last year. It is of this withdrawal that I complain, and I think justly; for while they were there we had peace, uninterrupted peace, and as soon as they left us, the cruel butchery of our people commenced.

Now, I take it for granted, that the promise made by the Secretary of War to-day will be carried out in good faith, and that troops will be placed upon the route in time for the emigration to Oregon this season. But look at the economy; look at the principle; look at the system of political economy of the Administration so lauded by the gentleman from Maryland. I am a thousand times obliged to the gentleman for his kindness towards Oregon in the last Congress, and I have no doubt that I shall often have occasion to thank him for his kindness towards Oregon in this Congress. Oregon needs much. She has no vote here. She can only ask others to give her what she wants, and I pledge my word that I will ask for nothing in her behalf that is not absolutely essential to her welfare, and to which she is not justly entitled.

Now, this regiment of mounted rifles was ordered to Oregon; it was then ordered back again; and now it is necessary to send out another force there. That is a beautiful system of economy! The gentleman from Maryland seems to think that the Administration are entitled to great credit for this system of moving and counter-moving, and marching and counter-marching troops. But is it good economy or good policy to march troops to Oregon and march them back again, while they were subserving the very purpose intended by Congress in authorizing the raising of the regiment, and then march out more troops? Yet that seems to be the policy of the Administration.

The former Delegate from Oregon [Mr. Thurston] may have said that this rifle regiment was not needed there. I have great respect for that gentleman's memory, and for his intelligence. He has now passed away; but if he made such a statement as that, he certainly was not consulting the interests of that Territory, and how he could have said such a thing, I cannot conceive. While it may be true that the troops were not needed in the settlements, they were certainly needed on the emigrant route, from Independence to the waters of the Columbia, and on the route from Oregon to California.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] said to-day, in the course of his remarks, that he did not know why the troops should be posted at the points indicated in this resolution. I will now explain to the gentleman, why it is necessary that they should be so arranged. The gentleman will recollect that there are two great roads, one leading from St. Joseph, in Missouri, via Fort Hall, to the Dalles of the Columbia river; the other from Oregon City to California.

This latter road passes through the Rogue River Valley, which is near the dividing line between Oregon and California, and runs through a country where there are no white settlements at all, but which is inhabited by as warlike and ferocious Indians, as any of our North American tribes, and they have succeeded in ambushing the road and cutting off numerous parties of our citizens passing to and from Oregon and California.

The interests of California and Oregon are identical; they never can be separated; lying upon the western slope of the Rocky Mountains, they form an important portion of this country, and everything should be done, that can be consistently done by Congress and the Administration, to afford to them everything that they need, or at least to protect those who are moving there. This rifle regiment, I repeat, ought never to have been ordered to Texas, for their service belongs to Oregon. We ought to have troops sufficient for the protection of the people who go to Oregon, and I have no doubt that it will be so, as I rely upon the assurances of the Secretary.

[Here a message was received from the President of the United States.]

Mr. EVANS. I want to ask the gentleman a question as to the character of the Indians in Oregon, as to whether they are warlike or not, and whether they have lately been making war upon the citizens of that Territory? I want to know how many troops will be necessary for the protection of that Territory, and whether the inhabitants are not able to take care of themselves, and what the probable cost of those troops would be? If the gentleman desires to pursue another train of argument, however, I will not insist on his answering them now. But I desire to have them answered.

Mr. LANE. I prefer to go on with the branch of the subject I was elucidating a little further, and then I will answer the gentleman's questions. I remarked that the interests of Oregon and California were identical. Oregon, to some extent, is a gold-producing country, but it is not so uniformly diffused over it as in California. But she has within her borders what is more valuable, a soil of inexhaustible fertility, finely adapted to the growth of everything that is needed for the subsistence of man; and is now in part supplying, and must eventually furnish, California with all agricultural productions needed. Hence the great road leading from one country to the other demands imperiously your protection. Now, we desire that there shall be a garrison stationed somewhere in the Rogue River Valley, through which this road passes; for we must pass through that valley on the route from Oregon to California. We also ask that a garrison shall be placed upon the other road, in the Snake river country, somewhere between Fort Hall and the Grand Ronde.

I will now answer the interrogatories of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] There are about sixty tribes of Indians in Oregon. There are about five times as many Indians as whites in the Territory. The tribes near the settlements are in general friendly disposed, and an easy people to govern. We have no reason to fear any difficulty from them. But the Indians on the road from Oregon to California are, as I said before, as fierce and warlike as any on the face of the globe, and they are as capable of conducting war. Major Kearney—and every gentleman here knows that we have no officer in the Army who stands higher for courage; he is the officer who gallantly carried the gates of the city of Mexico, with a shattered and disabled arm dangling at his side—yet this officer, with the intrepid Walker, and a small force of as good troops as ever drew sabre, declined on one occasion to give them battle till he was reinforced. The Indians were well mounted, and well armed, and five hundred or six hundred strong.

Now when such Indians as those infest the great highway from Oregon to California, can it be expected that without a garrison and without troops our people are safe in passing from one country to another? Sir, within the last few years many parties passing this road have been attacked, and many of them murdered and their property destroyed.

They have thus been elated by success and have grown bold, and are growing bolder still, and nothing will keep them in subjection but troops garrisoned there. Now the same may be said as to the other, the emigrant road between Fort Hall and the Dalles of the Columbia river. Depredations have been committed on that road of such a savage and cruel and barbarous nature, that I will not ask this House to listen to their recital; they are too revolting to the feelings of our nature. Suffice it to say, young ladies have fallen into their hands, and whole families have been destroyed. Under the inducements which have been held out by Congress, many of our people have attempted to emigrate, and fallen upon the way. That frontier cannot be protected unless the Government takes the matter into its own hands. It is not in the power of the few thousands of people in that Territory to protect a frontier of some seven hundred miles. It is impossible for them to furnish sufficient force to subdue those Indians. I do not exaggerate when I say, that many thousands of dollars worth of property have there fallen into the hands of the Shoshone or Snake Indians. I do not exaggerate when I say, that many lives have been taken, that many men, women, and children have been murdered in the most shocking and horrible manner. Now, was it just to the emigrants to that country—was it right, under these circumstances, to have ordered that regiment from that country, and thus leave it open to these savage depredators? I must confess that I did not expect to see my friend from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] take the position which he assumed yesterday. I did not expect that a gentleman representing any portion of a State so chivalrous as Texas—a State so prompt in doing her duty in defending herself and the country—should ask the services of this regiment, and that Oregon should be deprived of all protection.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I have made no such request. I am perfectly willing that Oregon shall be defended, and that the Government shall send troops there for her defence. What I said was, that the Secretary of War had stated that these troops were not the best for Oregon. He says now that the reports will show that the mounted men in Oregon have not rendered service at all commensurate with the expense which the country has been put to in relation to this character of troops, and that foot forces are still the best for that Territory. But this regiment, as the gentleman from Maryland states, after being in a great degree disbanded in Oregon, the troops having deserted so that there was but a mere skeleton left, who, with the officers, brought home the horses that were not sold, at a large expense, and were posted in Texas. Now, I want to know where is the reason for sending them back? If mounted forces are necessary there, then give them an independent mounted force—give them another regiment. But, sir, I will come to a compromise with the honorable gentleman from Oregon. If he will give us in Texas, for three years, those mounted rangers, he may then take back the troops; he may have them re-transported to Oregon.

But I think the Department have taken the ground which they have taken in relation to this matter wisely, and for this reason: The population of Oregon and of California is composed principally of young men without families, and, of course, a population of this description is much more competent to defend itself, than one composed of persons who have settled with their families—with women and children, as is the case in Texas. If the present army cannot defend the frontier of that country, by calling for volunteers, a population composed chiefly of young men is certainly much better adapted to defend themselves, than such a population as exists in Texas. We all know that the frontiers of Texas have ever since annexation, been depredated upon, more or less, by hostile Indians. We know that for the last three years the frontiers of Mexico have been depredated upon by the Indians, now resident in the United States; and that no efficient or fair means have been taken to carry out that treaty; and that this regiment has been brought there, not only to protect the people of Texas and New Mexico, but to protect and carry out the treaty stipulations which you have obligated yourselves to carry out with the Republic of Mexico. And more than that; it seems to me to be a most extraordinary position, that men going to a country must be protected, but that men who are settled in a country with their families, and liable to like depredations, shall not be protected.

Mr. LANE. The gentleman from Texas is as much at fault in his assertions, as was the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] This regiment was not ordered from California, but from Oregon.

Mr. HOWARD. I had my authority from the Secretary of War. They are part in Oregon, and part in California; indeed, the headquarters of General Smith was at San Francisco.

Mr. LANE. But none of the rifles were there.

Mr. HOWARD. That is not the statement of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LANE. Now in reply to the gentleman's argument as to their being relatively more young and unmarried men in Oregon than in Texas, let me assure him that he is egregiously at fault. Congress, you know, sir, has enacted a law donating to all emigrants who would take a claim in that country, and cultivate it for four years, as follows: to a married man 320 acres, one-half in his own right, and one half in her own right; to an unmarried man 160 acres, and to his wife 160 more in her own name, if he marries in twelve months after locating his claim; the consequence is, sir, we have few unmarried men or women in our country; the ladies, always quick to discover their interests, and prompt to avail themselves of any opportunity to promote it, have not only all wedded who were there, but many more have gone there and married, and have husbands and lands both, so that the gentleman must discover that if fighting men cannot be obtained except they are unmarried, no country is more destitute of them than Oregon.

There are some troops in California, but not more than are needed there, and indeed not as many. California is as much exposed as any country possibly can be, from the locality of the country, from its formation, and from its many scattered valleys. Its immense amount of gold induces the people to wander all over the country, and for that reason they are exposed more than they otherwise would be.

Now, I am going to state simply, that the troops in Oregon consist of not more than forty to ninety men. They are artillery troops occupying garrisons, or something like garrisons, upon the seacoast. A few of them are at Fort Sillacocon, on Puget Sound, and a few of them at Columbia barracks. None of them can be used in the defence of the frontiers of that country. Now, I repeat, the Secretary of War has told me to-day, that for the protection of the emigrants bound to Oregon, he will cause troops to march out, to be there in time for this year's emigration. That will satisfy me so far as that is concerned, and it will satisfy the emigrants, and insure their protection, if the troops are kept upon the road. There is one other route which the Secretary should place troops upon, and that is the great road leading from Oregon to California, and then we should have the protection which the people absolutely require.

I have said nothing about the right of this House to request the President, for this resolution was nothing more than a request, or if you please, a petition. Whenever the day arrives when this House cannot, or dare not, or will not, for some imaginary reason, say that they have no right to respectfully ask and request the President of the United States to afford protection to our frontiers, then I will be prepared to say we do not enjoy the liberties which I heretofore have supposed, and still believe we enjoy. When has the time arrived in which it is improper to do so?

I hope I need not add, that I am as fully aware as any gentleman on this floor, that this House has no power to command the President to do anything in the premises; my object was not to command him; and it is passing strange to me that gentlemen will insist that it is designed to be so. My object was to obtain an expression of the sense of this body upon the propriety of extending the protection to the people I represent, which I think is their due, not doubting that the President would give such respectful consideration to such expression as is due to such a high source. I also desired to bring this subject to the attention of the country at large, and my constituents in particular. Why, sir, this is certainly a novel idea, that this House has no right, by abstract resolution, if you please, to indicate its sense of any Executive proceeding, or what ought to be Executive action. Sir, your Journals, through the whole history of the Government, are full of such precedents, and especially has this been the habit of the party now in power. While upon this subject, permit me to remark, that, although no lawyer, yet I think I rightly understand the constitutional obligations resting upon the President and upon the Congress. It is for Congress to make the laws, and for the President to execute them. While it is true that he is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, it is also true that it is his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed; hence I infer that if Congress, in raising troops for a particular service, should direct their field of operations, it would be the duty of the Chief Magistrate to execute the will and directions of the law-making power.

It is now about time to withdraw this resolution, or rather to let it take its regular course.

Mr. EVANS. I would ask the gentleman, what would be the probable cost of supporting the troops he proposes to have sent to Oregon?

Mr. LANE. I am by nature and practice, and in every other way, an economist, and in asking protection for Oregon, I studied economy. I was unwilling to ask for what she really needs, because it will cost much, and more than Congress might think proper. For that reason I put it low. I stated, in a letter to the President, that two or three companies of cavalry would be sufficient to afford the needed protection on the emigrant road between Fort Hall and the Dalles, and two or three companies of the same description of troops in the Rogue River Valley between Oregon and California.

I also stated, that if mounted troops could not be had, that infantry forces ought to be sent out; not that I believed for a moment that we could wage war successfully with infantry, but that a garrison in the country would have a moral influence upon the Indians, that would do much towards keeping peace with them.

I have many apologies to make to this House for trespassing so long upon their time. It is the first occasion that I have found it necessary to say a word or occupy the time of this House, but it was an occasion upon which I thought I ought to avail myself of the privilege which you have extended to me. I must look to this House for the adoption of such measures as are necessary for the protection of Oregon.

I should like to have the vote upon the passage of the resolution reconsidered, and that the resolution lie upon the table.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I demand the previous question.

The previous question received a second; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The main question, which was upon reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was adopted, was then put, and it was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. I now move that the resolution lie upon the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. CABELL, of Florida, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the petition and papers of Richard Fitz Patrick, for the purpose of reference in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. ABERCROMBIE, it was Ordered, That the papers and petition of Wade Allen be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. HENN, it was Ordered, That the papers and petition of Solomon Rush-ton be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. HASCALL, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 11, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, a report of the Board of Commissioners on Claims against Mexico; which states, that the whole amount awarded on all the claims allowed by the Board was $3,208,314 96, and that the sum stipulated by the United States by the 15th article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to make satisfaction for the claims of their citizens against the Mexican Republic was three millions and a quarter, which exceeds, by $41,685 04, the total amount of the awards of the Board of Commissioners.

Mr. MASON. That information was called for by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROTHHEAD.] He is not in his seat.

Mr. WADE. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I will state, that the resolution was introduced at the instance of the Committee of Claims, for information which they wanted in regard to a certain claim. If, therefore, the Senator from Virginia will permit me, I will move that the communication be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MASON. I should be quite willing that this communication should be referred to the Committee of Claims, so that we might have the action of that committee on the subject, but there is a large number of these claimants whose memorials have been referred by the Senate to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and we have had them under consideration. I will not interfere with the motion of the Senator from Ohio, but merely state the fact I have already mentioned.

Mr. WADE. I will not persist in the motion. I supposed that the resolution emanated from that committee, and for the purpose which I have mentioned.

Mr. MASON. Then I will move that this communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that it be printed.

Mr. WADE. I am quite agreeable to that reference.

The communication was so referred.

CREDITORS OF CHEROKEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, copies of all correspondence between that Department, including the office of Indian Affairs, and persons claiming to be creditors of the Western Cherokees since the last session of Congress.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. That information was called for at the instance of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was intended to assist that committee in the investigation of claims now under their consideration. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that it be printed.

* The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the petition of the guardian of the heirs of the late Major Thomas Noel, of the United States Army, praying the settlement of his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWSON presented the petition of Avery Downer, praying a pension for services during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of William Woodbridge, praying a section of land in consideration of the services of his father, a soldier in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of William H. Platt, President of the Alton and Sangamon Railroad Company, in the State of Illinois, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of that railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the memorial of Benjamin S. Roberts, of the Army, praying to be allowed the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant of dragoons from the time he was discharged from the Army to the time of his appointment as a lieutenant of mounted riflemen; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Benjamin Arnold, praying indemnity for property destroyed by the enemy during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of citizens of Guthrie county, Iowa, praying a donation of land for the use of the county seat of that county; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of James C. Mitchell, and the petition of William Simpson, praying a donation of land for the benefit of the town of Kaneshville, Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

VICTIMS AND EXILES.

Mr. BADGER. I have a petition from one more of the victims of the square root. It is from S. N. Smithurst, one of the assistant marshals in North Carolina, employed in taking the Seventh Census in Martin county, praying for additional compensation. While I offer this petition, I beg leave also to present a paper containing a statement with respect to the petition of H. B. Lewis, a deputy marshal in Tyrrel county, explaining the great difficulties he labored under in taking the census. I move to refer both of these papers to the Committee of Claims.

They were so referred.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a memorial to present, sir, in behalf of four hundred victims. It is only signed by two, sir, and they do not represent themselves as victims, but they petition for others. It comes to me under the post office mark of New York, and it purports to be sent by Carl Prochaski and Christian Dembinski, adopted citizens, they say, of the United States. They represent that the brother of this Charles, as I suppose this name Carl means, has been banished to Siberia, under the pretenses of having committed some crime against the Russian Government. They represent that the conviction was obtained upon testimony which was false in toto. They also represent that there are four hundred others confined in Siberia under like erroneous proceedings against them in the courts of Russia; and having, as they say, understood that the Congress of these glorious United States intend to manifest generous, active, and operative sympathy in behalf of suffering convicts banished by other countries, they pray that the same sort of sympathy may be extended to the brother of one of these petitioners and the other four hundred in Siberia. They say further, that they believe the Russian Government will lend a very favorable consideration to any application from this Government, upon the assurance being given that they will all be brought to the United States.

I had some difficulty in my mind, Mr. President, with regard to presenting this memorial, not knowing but it might be intended to humbug me or Congress, from the fact which must be known to the Senate, that in the early movements upon this subject of intervention, I was among the first to denounce the whole proceeding. I did not, therefore, know but the petition might have been sent to me for such a purpose as I have suggested; but recollecting that an illustrious associate in the other branch of Congress was very eloquent on the subject of the right of petition and upon intervention, I concluded to present the petition to the Senate, and to make the declaration, that I have determined, if any more petitions of a like character come to my hands, I will hand them over to some more active sympathizer in the objects prayed for, and especially those who act for "victims," as they are called.

Mr. BADGER. I rise for the purpose of making a motion as to the disposition of this memorial, and I would suggest—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg pardon; I would suggest that it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BADGER. The petition states that the judgments under which these exiles are suffering a hard captivity in that frozen and inhospitable region were erroneous. I would therefore move a reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report a bill so to amend our laws as to provide that a writ of error may be taken to our Supreme Court from the Supreme Court of the Russian Empire. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Perhaps that is rather premature. According to the suggestion of the memorialists, they recommend the sending out of a commissioner to ascertain the facts before a writ of error is provided for.

Mr. BADGER. But the difficulty is, that before that can be done the five years' limitation of these writs of error may expire. I think this thing ought to be done immediately, if it is done at all. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw the motion to refer the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will withdraw that motion; and, if the reference will better suit the views of my friend from North Carolina, I will move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. No! no! [Laughter.] You are not in earnest, are you?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. I did not hear distinctly what the Senator from Kentucky proposed, nor indeed what he said in regard to this memorial; and I would like to know whether he is acquainted with these memorialists, and if he knows who they are, so that, if possible, the Senate may judge whether or not this petition is or is not what the Senator from Kentucky expresses his doubts that it may be, namely, a humbug?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have stated all that I know upon the subject. There is the New York post-mark upon it; and that is all that I know.

Mr. MASON. Then I think the best disposition that can be made of it is, to lay it upon the table. I make that motion.

The memorial was accordingly laid upon the table.

PAPER WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. NORRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition of John McAvoy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

bill for that purpose; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of Thomas A. Napier, reported a bill to authorize a new register for the American built ship Obed Mitchell; which was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and, no amendment being made, it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of David P. Weekes, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill to reduce and define the boundaries of the military reserve at the St. Peter's river, in the Territory of Minnesota, and to secure the rights of the actual settlers thereon; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Pensions, to which the petition of Elizabeth V. Lomax was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the documents relating to the claim of Theodore E. Elliott, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GEYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Barbara Riley, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. GEYER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the message of the President of the United States, of the 25th January, respecting claims of citizens of California; and that it be laid upon the table.

DISTRICT COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CLEMENS asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to be entitled "An act to change the times of holding the United States district courts in Alabama, and for other purposes;" which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope it may be read a second time now.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill provides that the district courts of the United States for the State of Alabama shall be held at Mobile, on the fourth Monday in April, and on the second Monday after the fourth Monday in November; at Huntsville, on the second Monday in May, and the second Monday in November; at Montgomery on the fourth Monday in May, and the fourth Monday in November; and also, that the county of Butler shall be a part of, and embraced in the middle district of said State.

The bill was then considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being offered, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADDITIONAL POST ROUTE.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Rockland, in the county of Sinclair, to the Isle au Haut, in the county of Lincoln, in the State of Maine.

UNITED STATES JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the district judge of the United States for the district of Michigan.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope that resolution will lie over until to-morrow, as I desire to submit an amendment to it in relation to another case of a like character.

The resolution was accordingly passed over.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. M. P. FILLMORE, his Private Secretary, transmitting the annual report of the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, showing the operations of the Mint and its branches for the year 1851;

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Interior, containing a report from Thomas U. Walter, Architect for the extension of the Capitol; and

A copy of the instructions dispatched from the Department of State to the Minister of the United States at London, respecting the attack on the United States steamer "Prometheus," in the harbor of San Juan de Nicaragua, by the British brig of war "Express;" and also, a copy of the dispatches of Mr. Lawrence to that Department and of his correspondence with Her Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the same subject.

These several messages were referred,

The first to the Committee on Finance; the second to the Committee on Public Buildings; and the third to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and they were ordered to be printed.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. BUTLER. At the last session of Congress there was a bill passed authorizing notaries public of different States and Territories to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases; but under some misapprehension, it did not include the District of Columbia. I move to take up that bill now, for the purpose of amending it in that particular.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina, whether it will involve debate?

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all; it is only to supply a single word.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The amendment which extended to notaries public in the District of Columbia the same power to take and certify to oaths, affirmations, &c., which is conferred on the same class of officers, in the States and Territories, was adopted; and the bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CENSUS COMPENDIUM.

Mr. SEWARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution concerning the publication of a compendium of the several censuses of the United States. It proposes that a joint committee of the two Houses be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare, or cause to be prepared, and report for immediate use, a compendium of such prominent statistics of the late and prior censuses, as to them may seem important, for the present information of the people and Congress, accompanied by a report containing such other information relative to the progress of agriculture, arts, manufacture, commerce, and the general wealth of the United States, as they may deem useful.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I move to dispense with the special order to-day, for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 1, which is a bill making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of a railroad in that State. My friend from Tennessee (Mr. BELL) has had the floor on this subject, at least four or five days, and has been unable to proceed with his speech. He commenced his remarks on the day when the bill was last under consideration and spoke some five minutes, when the Senate adjourned. He is now prepared to go on with his remarks, and I hope that the bill will be taken up, so that he may proceed with them.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to my friend from Iowa the propriety of withdrawing that motion for the present. The Senator from New York (Mr. SEWARD) had the resolution in relation to the Irish exiles postponed until one o'clock to-day; and as that subject is the special order, and as the time is now past, I think he ought to be heard. I can readily realize the hardship imposed upon my friend from Tennessee, as it has been suggested by my friend from Iowa; but as both he and myself intend to speak to the Senate, and as we have something to say, which I trust will be worth hearing, our speeches will keep. There is no danger whatever of their spoiling.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I trust that my colleague will withdraw his motion, and allow the special order to be proceeded with.

Mr. JONES. I will withdraw the motion with a great deal of pleasure, if my friend from Tennessee desires it to be withdrawn.

Mr. BELL. I will assent with great pleasure to any arrangement which may be agreed upon by gentlemen.

Mr. JONES. I would withdraw the motion immediately, but I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BELL. I shall not regard it as any discourtesy at all.

The motion was then withdrawn.

EXILED IRISH PATRIOTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, on the 2d of December, expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien and Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates.

The pending question was Mr. SEWARD's amendment to the amendment of Mr. SHIELDS.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, this resolution seems to me neither inconsiderate nor unimportant. It is a resolution which must have the assent of both Houses of Congress, and the approbation of the President of the United States, and so will become a national act. It recommends, I might perhaps say solicits, clemency towards the patriots of Ireland who are suffering imprisonment in a penal colony; and it is designed for the information of the British Government, and therefore may and ought to be regarded as an appeal by the United States to Great Britain.

Sir, I think the proceeding is defensible upon the grounds of abstract justice and propriety, as well as upon a due consideration of the relations of all the parties concerned.

I beg leave to say, in the first place, that it is not altogether novel in character and principle. The patriots of Ireland, who are the subjects of this debate, are suffering imprisonment in consequence of an effort, honestly made, to restore their native land to liberty and independence. The sympathy expressed by this resolution for them, springs from the same source from which the sympathy of the people of the United States has sprung, which has been habitually exhibited towards nations striving to assert the same rights—the sympathy which was expressed by the people of the United States towards France in 1793, in 1830, and in 1848; towards Greece, towards the rising South American republics, towards Poland, towards Germany, and towards Hungary. Even in form, sir, the measure assimilates to the action of Congress in regard to Louis Kossuth, who has been, through our interposition, released from imprisonment in Asia Minor, and brought to our shores, received and welcomed as a guest of the United States.

The interest which is expressed in this resolution, for William Smith O'Brien, like that which is expressed toward Louis Kossuth, is not merely personal, but it is the reverential compassion indulged by the people of the United States for a fallen nation "in a man comprised." It is not, then, the cause of William Smith O'Brien alone—it is the cause of Ireland.

The merits of a nation's cause, and of its defenders, require a review, not merely of the particular accidents or incidents which bring it before us, but of the whole life of the nation. So it was that our forefathers, in adopting the declaration of American independence, reviewed the entire colonial experience in vindication of the act of abjuration of their allegiance to the British Throne.

Ten centuries ago, sir, Ireland was an independent nation, possessing the elements and the forces of national stability. Ireland was guilty of one enduring crime—it was the crime of proximity to England. Ireland labored under one enduring misfortune—it was the misfortune that, for many centuries, she had remained unconquered and unconquerable. The crime provoked the cupidity of England, the misfortune begat divisions into sects and clans, and these civil distractions favored an invader. At the very moment, sir, when Henry, a Norman King of England—the second of that name, I think—was, as the chronicle relates, "casting in his mind to conquer the adjacent island, because it seemed to him to be commodious, and because its inhabitants were savage and rude," he was applied to by a deposed Irish prince to reinstate him on the throne. The invader enjoyed one vast advantage: England had been successively subjugated by the Romans, the Danes, the Saxons, and the Normans, and in that rough experience she had acquired the consolidation and discipline which, combined with the energy arising from a mingling of races, and an ambition springing from an insular position, have enabled her almost "to have the world in empire."

The invasion, of course, did not result in restoring the Irish King, nor did it result in the conquest of Ireland. It ended in only the establishment of a small colony upon the coast, enclosed with palisades, and therefore called "The Pale." Within the "Pale" were Englishmen, English Lords, English manners, English customs, and English rule; and without the "Pale" were the entire nation of Irishmen, with their hereditary princes, their native language, and customs, and manners.

Acting upon the law of nations, as it was then understood, these races regarded each other as natural enemies, and hence ensued wars unsparing and unrelenting. The Reformation hurled a new element into this internecine strife. The Catholic Church in England had given place to one which suited its Kings and people better. Considerations of prudence cooperating with a spirit of proselytism, determined the Government of England to subvert the Catholic Church in Ireland. The sword was the missal sent, and a ferocious soldiery were the apostles of the new faith. The Irish preferred their paternal religion to that which was so rudely recommended to them by their enemies. The "Pale," although backed by England, was too feeble to subjugate Ireland, and Ireland, distracted by the jealousies of her clans, was too weak to crush the "Pale;" and so for four hundred years continued wars, at the end of which both parties retained their relative positions and power. And thus all that important portion of the nation's life was worse than lost, in consequence of an imperfect conquest. At last five hundred and twenty years after the first invasion by Henry, and at the close of the great battle fought on the banks of the Boyne, Ireland capitulated, and at that time the entire twelve millions of acres of tillable land were divided and parceled out among the invaders and the few apostatizing natives. Ireland capitulated, and by the treaty of Limerick, subjected herself to the government of the "Pale." But she reserved, in the most solemn manner, the liberty of conscience. This right—the liberty of conscience—was not only stipulated by the treaty of Limerick, but was solemnly guaranteed by William and Mary, the common sovereigns of the two countries.

England, nevertheless, persevered in her policy of subverting the Catholic Church, changing only the means employed for that purpose. She perfidiously broke the covenants of peace, though they had been written in blood, and established a Penal Code, disfranchising the Catholic Irish people of all civil and political, social and domestic liberty, as well as of their ecclesiastical rights, and thus substituted for invading armies the sterner despotism of the law, and withdrew the sword to replace it with the scaffold.

Sir, I shall not detail that atrocious code, but will content myself by giving a description of it, drawn by Edmund Burke, seventy years ago—a description which time has now proved prophetic:

"It is," says he, "a system full of coherence and consistency, well digested and well disposed in all its parts fitted for the impoverishment,"—(yes, sir, these are the words,)—"fitted for the impoverishment and the degradation of a people, and for debasing in them of human nature itself."

The after history of Ireland, Mr. President, is a record of frequent and generous, but unavailing struggles, by or in behalf of the People, to cast off that code, and, more recently, to redeem the country from its desolating effects. In the year 1778, Grattan, Burke, and Flood, profiting by the enthusiasm awakened throughout the world by the American Revolution, and by the embarrassment of the British Government in consequence of it, succeeded in obtaining from the British Parliament a relaxation of the rigors of this code in regard to education and the rights of property; and, in the year 1782, when the exigencies of the British Government had become more alarming, they succeeded in wresting from the British King and Parliament a renunciation of legislative and sovereign power over the Kingdom of Ireland; and it was expressed in these solemn and memorable words:

"The rights claimed by the people of Ireland, to be bound only by laws enacted by His Majesty and the Parliament of that Kingdom, shall be and are established, and, at no time hereafter, shall be questioned or questionable."

Sir, Ireland exulted for a delirious moment in national independence regained; but it was only for a moment, and that moment was delirious. Ireland required the repeal of the penal code, and demanded a constitution. The Parliament and the "Pale," constituted of a Protestant representation alone, and being in the interest of England, refused both. Discontent, wide and deep, pervaded the Irish people. Emmett, Fitzgerald, and their associates, in 1798, conspired to raise the standard of insurrection; but they were betrayed, and the rebellion was crushed in the germ.

The Government of Great Britain now assumed that the people of Ireland had tried, fully and fairly tried, the experiment, and had proved themselves incapable of exercising the franchise of self-government. The British Parliament therefore sent down to the Parliament of the Pale what was called an act of Union, and in the year 1800 that mockery of a legislature adopted it, and surrendered its own perfidious and pernicious existence. By that act of Union, Ireland, in May, 1800, was in name united, but was in fact absorbed, and became virtually a province of the British Empire, with only the shadow of a representation of the Protestant minority of the Kingdom in the British Parliament. Daniel O'Connell, a jurist and advocate of surpassing genius, eloquence, and learning, inferring, from the failure of the men of 1798, that the time for a martial revolution had passed away, at least for the present, conceived the bold purpose of obtaining a repeal of the penal code and the restoration of his country to a place among the nations, by a process of civil agitation, always within the restraints of the law, and looking for the effect through the action of the King and Parliament of England. In the year 1829 he obtained a signal triumph in the passage of the act of Catholic emancipation. There remained but one step between this memorable act and the freedom and independence of Ireland. That step was the repeal of the Act of Union. But the ruin and desolation resulting from the penal code, which Burke had predicted, pressed too hard upon the march of the Reformer. Ireland could not wait the slow progress and doubtful success of civic agitation. The nation divided between the parties of "Old Ireland," following the lead of Daniel O'Connell and his peaceful standard, and of "Young Ireland," under the revolutionary banner set up by William Smith O'Brien. Now, in point of fact, it is possible that even if the Irish people had remained united, neither of those policies would have been successful; but it is also certain, that when the nation divided and broke, both efforts signally failed. Daniel O'Connell died of a broken heart at Genoa, on a pilgrimage to Rome, and William Smith O'Brien, the leader of the Irish rebellion, being found without attendants, arms, or troops, was arrested, convicted of high treason, and sentenced to an ignominious death. His sentence being commuted by the Crown, he is now an exile in Van Dieman's Land.

Simultaneously with the failure of these, the last efforts hitherto made for the redemption of Ireland, poverty and pestilence stalked abroad through that ill-fated country, exciting the sympathy of nations, and moving even the distant people and Congress of the United States to send relief. Depopulation of the Island assumed a frightful momentum, and, from that time to this, has continued to give the last confirmation, which the most sceptical could have required, of the conclusion, that never on earth was a revolution more just or more necessary, than that attempted by William Smith O'Brien and his companions in exile.

Sir, it is not my object in this review, to excite prejudices, here or elsewhere, against England, or against the Protestant Church within that Kingdom. I have no such prejudices myself. I disclaim and disdain partisanship in regard to historic events. O'Connell was a Catholic; Smith O'Brien is a Protestant. The rage of the sects has died away in the agony of the catastrophe which has involved the people of both in a common desolation; and wise and sagacious men in England look on the decay of Ireland as an alarming presage of the decline of the empire. But, sir, on an occasion like this, Ireland is entitled to, and from me she has received, her vindication. The policy of England was the policy of the age, and of the times, and of systems; and this is her sufficient apology.

The sympathy of the American people, then, in behalf of Ireland, is just.

I proceed to remark, that this sympathy derives intenseness from the conceded genius and proverbial virtues of the Irish people. The plains of Waterloo, and the heights of Abraham, attest that they are brave as well as sagacious in war. Like the Greeks, in their decline, they have enchanted the world with their wit and song and eloquence. They are confessedly confiding and generous to a fault, while their whole history, and tradition reaching now a period of a thousand years, exhibit not one instance of unlawful aggression. Is not, then, the tribute proposed by this resolution, due to such a people? And if so, why shall it not be offered?

I am answered, that this is a question for the British Government, and that it is they, and not we, who are to extend clemency or pardon to the Irish exiles. I grant it, fully grant it. But men and nations are moved by persuasion. What is asked here, is not an exercise of clemency, but only a word of persuasion whispered to the Power that can grant it.

I am told that we may lawfully sympathize, as individuals, in the misfortunes of these unhappy men, and of their more unhappy country; but that to us as a political body—a State or nation—or as the representatives—the Government of a nation—such sympathy is forbidden. This seems to me equivalent to saying that we may indulge sentiments of generous compassion, but we shall never carry them into beneficent action. The sympathy of the several members of this Senate, or of this Congress, or of the individual citizens of the United States, will be unavailing. If that sympathy is truly felt by the nation, it can only be effectually expressed in the manner in which national sympathies, and determinations of the national will, are always made effective—by the action of the Government. And, sir, let me say, that there is only one code of morals for mankind, and its obligations bind them equally, whether they be individuals, subjects, citizens, states, or nations.

I shall be told, that we may not intervene in this, which is a domestic affair of a foreign Government. It is true that we may not intervene in the affairs of any Government for unjust purposes, nor can we intervene by force for even just or benevolent purposes. But this is the only restraint imposed on us by the law of nations. That law, while it declares that every Government has the absolute right to deal with its own citizens, according to its own laws, independently of any other, affords a large verge and scope for the exercise of offices of courtesy, kindness, benevolence, and charity. It is Montesquieu who says that "the law of nations is founded upon the principle, that every nation is bound in time of peace to do to every other nation all the good it possibly can, and in time of war, the least evil it possibly can consistently with its own real interests." It is upon this humane principle that diplomatic intercourse is maintained among the civilized nations of the earth, all of whom are by the law of nations regarded as constituting one great commonwealth.

But, Mr. President, it will be said, that if we adopt this resolution, it will, however harmless it be in itself, furnish a precedent for mischievous intervention, either by ourselves in the affairs of other States, or by other States in our affairs hereafter. To admit this argument is to admit distrust of ourselves. We certainly do not distrust our own sense of justice. We do not distrust our own wisdom. So long as we remain here, then, we shall be able to guard against any such abuse of this precedent. Let us also be generous instead of egotistical, and let us believe that neither wisdom nor justice will die with those who occupy these places now, but that our successors will be as just and as wise as we are. So far as the objection anticipates an abuse of this precedent by foreign States, I have only to say, that if a foreign State shall ask of us just what we now propose, and no more, we shall have no difficulty and no ground of complaint. If it shall ask more, we shall be free to reject what is asked, as the British Government is free to reject our application.

Sir, this proposition involves a view of the relations of the parties concerned. The people of Ireland are affiliated to us, as we are to the people of Great Britain. Surely there can be no offence given by a younger member in offering mediation between the elder brethren of the same family upon a point of difference between them.

But what if Great Britain should take offence at this suggestion? What then? Why then England would be in the wrong, and we in the right. The time has passed when this country can be alarmed, by fear of war in such a case. No one will confess that he indulges any such apprehension. Sir, Great Britain will not take offence. She knows that her greatness and her fame are well assured. She has no motive whatever to affect wounded sensibility. She will receive this suggestion in the same fraternal spirit in which it is made. Nor will she refuse the boon. She knows as well as we do, that rigor protected beyond the necessity of security to the State, reacts. She knows full well, that for the present, at least, sedition sleeps profoundly in Ireland, and that the granting of this appeal will protract its slumbers. Great Britain will be thankful to us for our confidence in her generosity, for her motto is "Parcere subjectis et debellare superbis."

While it seems to me that it is certain that we may, with propriety and success, make this appeal to Great Britain, the circumstances in which we stand, in regard to Ireland, render the duty of making it imperative. But for the instructions and example of the United States, Ireland would never have attempted revolution in 1798, nor would William Smith O'Brien now have been an exile; for if it had not been for those instructions and that example, Ireland would long ago have sunk into the slumber of bondage that knows no waking. Again, sir: the failure of Smith O'Brien and his associates resulted from the exhaustion of Ireland. That exhaustion has contributed largely to the elements of our wealth, strength, and power. If we had not withdrawn the political and physical means of self-defence and of resistance from Ireland during the last sixty years, she would now have been able to have maintained a successful rebellion. When O'Connell gathered the populace upon the hill of Clare, he found that Ireland was deserted by the vigorous, the young, the strong, and that he was surrounded by the aged, the poor, and the spiritless. It is these reflections upon the propriety of the act itself, and upon the relations in which we stand towards the parties to it, that persuade my vote in favor of this resolution.

I have suggested to the consideration of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] some verbal amendments, which seem to me calculated to improve and perfect the resolution, in accordance with the wish he himself expressed. Their design is to guard more safely the dignity of Congress and of the United States. If rightly conceived, they will have that effect. But I am not tenacious of them. I shall not press them against the wishes of the Senator from Illinois. If they shall be adopted, the resolution will have my vote. If they shall not be adopted, it will have my vote. The resolution as originally introduced would have received my support. Equally shall it have my support in the modified form it has assumed, through deference to the wishes of other Senators.

And now, sir, when this resolution in any shape shall have been passed, there can be but one wish of mine in regard to the subject, that Congress would have power to gratify: That wish would be, that he who is now entitled to be regarded as the mover of the resolution, the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] should be made the bearer of this appeal to the "Sovereign Queen," in whose will and pleasure the granting of it will rest. It is the remembrance of a scene in one of the oldest and best of English poems which suggests this wish. It would be a goodly and a gracious sight to see that honorable Senator returning to his native land after his chivalrous and yet modest sojourn here, the bearer of a proclamation of amnesty from the sovereign of his native country thus obtained. "And I should rejoice to see the greeting of him by his countrymen,

"Shouting and clapping all their hands on high,
That all the ayre it fills and flies to Heavens bright."

Mr. BADGER. I had desired to say a few words on the subject of this resolution, and as the honorable Senator from New York has concluded his remarks in briefer space than was expected, I do not know of a more suitable occasion. After every examination which I have been able to give to this subject, I cannot persuade myself that it is proper that the Congress of the United States should pass the resolution in any of the forms in which it has been proposed to our consideration, or in which it has been suggested that it can be hereafter made worthier of our approbation. If I could vote for the resolution in any form, I would undoubtedly vote for it in that which it has assumed upon the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] and if anything could persuade me to forego the exercise of my own deliberate judgment, and put myself under the mastery of those feelings which are apt to be excited by discussions of this kind, to favor the adoption of the resolution, it would be the speech delivered on last Saturday by the honorable Senator from Illinois, full, as it was, of everything that can do honor to a man's head and heart.

But whatever my feelings of attachment, consideration, or sympathy for the other nations and races of the world—and I trust I am not deficient in those feelings of consideration and sympathy—I must prefer my own country, my own race, the people and institutions among which I was born, and in which I have been reared, to all other nations and all other races in the world. I cannot, therefore, consent to give my support to any measure, however commended to us by high considerations of sympathy, which, in my judgment, is capable of having an unjust and injurious operation upon the country to which I belong. I will not undertake to say what nation of the earth, if any, is next in my regard to my own; but any—all of them—if next, must be after a vast interval of distance.

This resolution proposes that the Congress of the United States shall express, and that the Congress of the United States shall declare, and that we feel it our duty to express an earnest desire that the Queen of Great Britain will extend her royal clemency to certain Irish prisoners now confined, under a sentence, to Van Diemen's Land. Now, in the first place, I do not feel myself called upon by my duty as an American Senator, to express any sentiment upon that subject. But that would be—that is—the smallest of the difficulties that press upon my mind. Though I cannot recognize the duty, yet if no evil consequences could be readily imagined to result from it, I might, nevertheless, be willing to give expression to the wish. But, sir, I ask you, who have had no little experience in the state and condition of our foreign affairs, and the management of our diplomatic relations with other countries, and the reciprocal operations of proceedings of this kind, whether we can affirm that there is no danger from the precedent which we are now setting?

My honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] in the remarks which he addressed to the Senate—remarks conceived and expressed, I will not say with a force and clearness that was not usual with him, but certainly with great force and clearness—when this subject was under consideration some fortnight ago, laid down some propositions to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senate, and to show, if I can, that the mode by which he undertakes to defend the proceedings now recommended to us, is one that must, or, at all events, one that may lead to mischievous counter interference with our concerns; and that the suggestions which he has thrown out for the purpose of dissipating the fear of such a result, when properly considered, are entitled to no weight.

First, the Senator laid down a proposition in these words:

"Mr. President, a great change has taken place in the opinions of the world on the subject of political offences. They nowhere carry with them reproach or shame. They violate, indeed, existing laws; but they generally originate in the most praiseworthy motives, and are pursued at the hazard of every earthly good, as Washington and a host of other illustrious men in ancient and modern days, pursued their patriotic enterprises."

Again, he says:

"They" (alluding to political offenders) "are recognized as being unfortunate, but not vicious. Indeed, they are often noble men, as are those whose case engages our attention, and who deserve the kind interest of the world, both from their motives and their character, and also from the position, once high, but now low, to which they have fallen, and in consequence of an effort, made, not for themselves, but for their country. It cannot be—there is not the slightest danger of it—that such a national application will ever be made, in any case but in one like this, which is as far from moral guilt as innocence is from crime. Let no one fear that this example will ever be used, or abused, for the purpose of intermeddling in the ordinary criminal proceedings of other powers."

Again, the honorable Senator says:

"As to improper interference, it seems to me an entire misconstruction of the term to apply it to a case like this. It is not interference at all; it is intercession. It is a simple request, made from the best motives, in the best spirit, and presented in the most unexceptionable language; and it leaves the British Government free to act its own pleasure, without giving us the slightest offence should the result be unsuccessful."

Now, I wish to say, in the first place, that this is interference. Intercession is one mode of interference. It is not an offensive mode of interference; but it is a mode of interference. He who undertakes to intercede between the judge and the offender—between the sovereign and his convicted subject, undoubtedly interferes. It seems to me that the honorable Senator is entirely mistaken in supposing that intercession is not interference. It is true that all interference is not intercession, because we may interfere by threats, by violence, by blows; but it is no less true, that every intercession is an interference. Then I am not exactly prepared to admit the fundamental, the original proposition, from which the argument of the honorable Senator from Michigan starts, which is, that political offences, though they violate existing laws, are yet offences accompanied with no moral guilt. I can conceive of such a thing as a political offence, which, though violating municipal laws, is not accompanied with moral guilt; but I do not think it is regularly, or generally the case, or can be affirmed as a proposition either universal, or with but few exceptions. But, assuming it to be so: then the honorable Senator says, we come forward and do not interfere, but intercede for these political offenders, upon the ground that they are persons free from moral guilt; that they are noble patriots, who have been condemned to a grievous imprisonment—originally condemned to the forfeiture of life, for the discharge of high acts of patriotic duty to their country; and that the noblest motives influenced them in what they had done; and that they are not to be considered as affected with any species of moral guilt.

Now, be it so. Assume that it is so, and that we wish it to be so. How was the transaction viewed by the British Government? That Government prosecuted these men as traitors—for an attempt to overturn the existing Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. For this offence they were convicted. For this offence they received the sentence of death; but the sentence was afterwards commuted to an expatriation or exile in Van Diemen's Land. It seems to me that the English Government will scarcely think, that when they have prosecuted these men for an offence of this kind, pronounced by their laws to be capital, when after conviction and judgment they have not thought proper to pardon the convicts, but have exchanged the sentence of death to that of banishment from the realm, that they are honorable and noble men, who have been influenced by high and patriotic motives in what they have done. The British Government look upon them in a far different light and description. Well, that being the case, how does it follow that we have no reason to fear, that if we set this example, we shall not have it followed with a very unpleasant and disagreeable interference in the administration of our own laws?

I come from a part of the country which is looked upon as especially conservative. When the breezes of public sentiment are blown until they have agitated the community into a state of almost incapacity to judge of what is right and prudent, in consequence of the proximity to certain portions of the United States, of motives, and considerations, and influences, that are apt to stir them into a great degree of excitement; we are in the habit of considering a little, (being ourselves somewhat removed from those immediate causes that operate to mislead the judgment,) to look a little ahead, and to inquire now what we do to-day, may be done in a very unpleasant manner in respect to ourselves to-morrow.

Now, let us suppose for one moment that some of the actors in the Christiana riot had been found guilty of high treason. They were indicted for that crime. High treason is a political offence. We know, in this country, of no treason like that which from time to time has been established by particular statutes in England. We know of no treason except levying war against the United States, or giving aid and comfort to their enemies. Suppose that the transaction in which any of these parties were engaged, had been declared to be an act of levying war against the United States—and that being an act, adopted in consequence of a concert to prevent entirely and in all cases the execution of a law of the United States, it was in no judicial sense to be discriminated from any other attempt to destroy the authority of the Government, and put an end to the supremacy of the laws: I pray you, sir, if that case would not in a few sympathizing minds, on the other side of the water, have presented a case with all the claims which the honorable Senator from Michigan brings forward in behalf of these Irish exiles, for the interference of the masses, or the Governments, or the Parliaments, or the other legislative assemblies on the other side of the water, under the strong feelings of modern humanity and general sympathy for the oppressed everywhere? Why, to those people these Christiana rioters would have appeared no less men—guilty, it is true, of committing the little technical offence of violating the municipal laws of the country, convicted, to be sure, of what was called treason against the United States, but influenced by high and noble motives, under the full inspiration of the “higher law” enthusiasm, which prompted them to come forward and at every earthly hazard, not for the benefit of themselves, but, as my friend from Michigan said with regard to these gentlemen, for the benefit of their country, to relieve the oppressed, and to prevent the wronged and hunted wayfarer from being dragged back into the captivity from which he had luckily escaped. They would be looked upon as men influenced by a high and lofty spirit of hospitality, who, with outstretched arms, were willing, even at the hazard of destroying the Constitution of their country, to carry into effect the high, noble, and generous purposes and impulses of their nature.

Mr. President, I confess the idea which has occurred to me, that a proceeding instituted by us might be extremely unpleasant and disagreeable when resorted to in future contingencies of the country by persons abroad, who would assume precisely the same position that the honorable Senator has assumed, that they were not interfering in our concerns, but only interceding—I say that my fear has not been removed by the assurances which he has given. I can well conceive that no application of this kind will be ever made by a foreign Government, that no resolutions will ever be adopted by the English Government, except in favor of those whom they think to be meritorious objects for their interposition; nor shall we ever adopt any proceeding, except in behalf of those whom we regard in that light. But that is not the question. If we are to interpose, and think we can interpose without offence, and that we can properly interpose, and that it is our duty to interpose, because we look upon these persons who have been sentenced to this punishment by a foreign nation as meritorious and noble men, entitled to our sympathies and accompanied with no moral blame—how can we resist the right of a foreign State, of a foreign Parliament or legislative body, to interfere in precisely the same mode with regard to citizens of ours whom we may think worthy of the extreme punishment, but which they regard as occupying the same relation to moral guilt which we attribute to the persons in whose behalf this resolution is now proposed? We should cut ourselves off, by adopting this proceeding, from any right to object. I see not where the thing would end. Resolutions of the British Parliament may be passed and sent to us, or communicated to us, in a kind of indirect, secret, and unostentatious mode, to which the Senator has referred, through their Minister in this country.

Upon this subject I wish to practice upon the old-fashioned morality of doing as I would be done by. I want no interference of foreign States or Governments in our internal affairs anywhere, and therefore I am not willing to set a practical example of such an interference on our behalf with their internal concerns. I know that this resolution springs from the highest and best motives. I know that my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] who has moved it, has, at least in my judgment, no superior in the honorable, the fine, and elevated sentiments that belong to the human heart. But it was well remarked, as I think Sallust, or some of those old Roman writers told us, that Cæsar once said in the Roman Senate, that there was never any course of measures which had brought ruin upon a country which, at the first outset, did not spring from some good motive, and in the initiative were intended to accomplish some good end.

Seeing, then, as I think I do, that the step which it is asked of us to take, may lead to the unpleasant and disagreeable consequences I have mentioned, I cannot myself vote for this resolution. But I beg to say, before going further, that in the illustration which I have selected for the purpose of conveying to the Senate the notion which I have of the evils to which we may be subjected, I do not mean at all to intimate that the gentlemen, to whom this resolution refers, are to be for one single instant confounded with the Christiana rioters whom I mentioned. Far otherwise. I intend no such odious or unpleasant comparison. I merely selected the case as an illustration of the principle upon which we may be hereafter assailed through a proceeding thus insulted by ourselves.

The honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] in the remarks which he submitted to the Senate this morning, after assuring us that there was no danger that Great Britain would take any offence at this proceeding, became exceedingly bold, and held in very slight regard and estimation, any, even the most serious, displeasure of that Power. I am not a very valiant man, and I confess myself to have a pretty large share of that extreme reluctance as well to cutting the throats of other people as to having my own cut, which is denominated by the word fear. And I go one step further. In my representative capacity I have a great deal of fear of involving this country in collisions with the great Powers of the earth. Who should not fear it? Is not war a dreadful evil? Is not a war with the greatest naval and commercial power of the earth, if in the latter respect our own country be excepted, a fearful evil? Who does not fear such evils? I fear them for my country. I fear them for those who may be called upon on such an occasion to wage the battles of the country. It is very easy for us, particularly for those of us who are past that age when we are liable to be called into the service of the country in the prosecution of any of the wars in which we may be involved, to talk lightly about force, and wounds, and battle, and death. If we know that the conflict is to be waged by others, and not by ourselves, we can be very brave with a very small amount of personal exposure. But I should fear such a result far more on another ground, and that is, I should fear my country producing upon itself the displeasure of other States by going out of its way to do what as a nation it had no right to do. I should fear putting ourselves wrong in the outset of such a proceeding. If we must have a conflict with Great Britain, or any other nation, let us be right in the commencement, in the prosecution, and throughout the whole conflict. And rely upon it, sir, that when such a conflict comes, if come it must, which God forbid, those who have some little salutary fear beforehand of the coming emergency, will not be found the least resolute to do what that emergency may require.

I have, however, an objection to this resolution of another and different kind from that suggested by the Senator from New York. It has been said by the Senator from Michigan, that Great Britain will not regard this in the light of an officious intermeddling with her concerns. We hear from various quarters that the probability is, that the British Government, acting upon this intimation of the wishes of the American people, will gladly interpose and discharge these gentlemen from their hard captivity. For one, I should be sorry that the British Government should, at our interposition, and as a favor to us, set these gentlemen at liberty. And why? Because it is very obvious that that places us under an obligation to the British Government. It not only entitles them to interfere, by way of interceding in behalf of our people, if any of them should be convicted of offences similar to that to which I have referred, but it also entitles them to come with a claim upon us that they should be heard. I, for one, am not willing that this country should lay itself under any such obligation to the clemency, or courteousness, or kindness of the British Queen.

I do not join in the denunciation which the honorable Senator from New York has this morning poured forth upon the conduct and character of the British Government, and the conduct and character of the British Church. But while I do not choose to enter into such tirades of denunciation upon any foreign nation or establishment, I nevertheless say this, that I wish to be indebted to them for no such favors as will entitle them to interfere in our domestic concerns in the first place, without any right of complaint on our part; and, in the second place, with the right of complaint on their part, if we do not treat their interposition as favorably as they have treated ours. And if I did pronounce the denunciation which the honorable Senator has this morning pronounced on the English Government and people, I could not make the disclaimer which he has made. He speaks of Ireland and the Irish as being the victims of the most detestable, barbarous, and unprincipled oppression. I do not mean to quote his words. That is the substance of what he said. At the same time he says, he has no prejudice against these oppressors. I do not understand how a man can extend his equal sympathy and regard to the oppressor and the oppressed, to the wrong-doer and the wronged. If the first part of the gentleman's argument be correct, it appears to me he cannot, without inconsistency, do otherwise than not merely denounce that Government, but have that is a proper word, prejudices against the Government and people, a just animosity founded upon the fact that, upon his own showing, they are totally unworthy of consideration and regard. I enter into none of these matters. I am not called upon here to pronounce as to the conduct and character of the British Government. I am not called upon here to pronounce as to the character and conduct of Messrs. O'Brien, Mitchell, and the other gentlemen who are in the calamitous condition of exiles from their country, under a sentence of banishment.

It is sufficient for me here, whatever opinions, as an individual, I may entertain upon the subject, to say that, as a Senator of the United States, I cannot consent to give my support to a measure which, whether it give offence or is met by approbation and accordance on the part of the British Government, seems to me will be followed in either case, and in the latter case personally and chiefly, with consequences which we may see occasion to deplore.

There is one sentiment which was expressed by my honorable friend from Michigan, which commands my most cordial approbation. I was struck with it. I felt its force, and the propriety of its application, to the question now under consideration, and some kindred subjects which, though not now before the Senate, lie upon the table. It is in these words:

“It is best to let a little common sense into our diplomatic questions.”

I know of no case which, according to my judgment, more requires that we should let that wholesome, sound proposition have due weight and influence upon us. Yes, sir, let us have a little common sense in the regulation of our concerns. Do not let us be carried away captive with emotions which, however generous and noble in themselves, do not furnish the proper guides for representative conduct. A man, in the private transactions of life, may allow a profuse generosity and inability to refuse any applicants for help, to exhaust his purse, and beggar himself for life; and when this is done, however severely we may disapprove of it, we are obliged to have a sympathy for him who, under such generous impulses, has sacrificed himself; but representatives and nations are bound, in my judgment, to have all their sympathies and feelings under thorough and complete control—to regulate themselves by understanding—to let common sense weigh, in all their deliberations, because they are not like a generous man who squanders his own, for if they yield themselves up to these unguided impulses, they squander what is not their own—the wealth, the power, the resources of the State of which they are only the representatives. They sacrifice not themselves, but their country.

With the kindest feelings and the highest respect for my honorable friend who takes an interest in the passage of this resolution, I must say, that for these reasons I cannot give it my vote in any form or shape.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I am much obliged to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, for introducing one or two topics on this occasion, more particularly since I saw them adverted to the other day, in the principal Administration paper.

Mr. BADGER. What paper is that?

Mr. CASS. It is called the "Republic."

Mr. BADGER. I never saw the article.

Mr. CASS. I would not have introduced the matter myself, but the remarks of the honorable Senator give me occasion to advert to it. That paper compared the speech which I made some time ago on this subject to that made by my honorable friend from Illinois; and said that mine was a very violent assault on the Government of England. Nothing could be further from my intention than to make any such assault. Whatever my opinion may be as to the English Government and people, (and there is much to commend in both,) it would have been a very improper occasion in me to have indulged here a hostile feeling towards England; and from one end of my speech to the other, there is not one word to which the most sensitive person on this subject can object. From my indistinct recollection of the subject, I remember that the only thing which I said which could possibly be construed into disapprobation of the English Government, was the remark, that an Irishman was the victim of harsh and hard laws at home. Well, there is not one Englishman from Land's End to John o' Groate's house, that would not say the same thing. I am therefore glad that my honorable friend from North Carolina has done me that justice, that a man with my speech before him in that very paper, would not do when he charged me with using violent and hostile language against England.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the honorable Senator does not mean to intimate that I have used any such language.

Mr. CASS. The very reverse. I am much obliged for the expression of his opinion on the subject; and I am contrasting that with the expression of opinion in the "Republic." It did not give me any trouble, but still I thought it better to advert to it.

The honorable Senator has alluded to another topic which I find in the same place; and although he does not go so far as the paper goes in his views on that subject, he differs from me. I refer to the subject of the moral turpitude now annexed to strictly political offences throughout the world. Why, he who has not marked the signs of the times on that subject, is entirely behind the age. He who does not know, that for the last fifty years there has been a wonderful progress and change in public opinion in respect to the moral turpitude of the men who are guilty of political offences, does not know the progress of opinion throughout the world upon this subject. In England I do not now remember how many species of punishment there were formerly, but I know there was quartering, and taking off their heads, and cutting out the bowels, and burning them, and other equally horrid punishments. But we hear of no such punishments at this day. Who would now stand up and advocate such punishments? The sentiments of the world have totally changed. The object three hundred years ago was to protect the person of the sovereign; that was the whole object in view; and laws were passed for that purpose. They made it the most infamous crime, which commanded the greatest moral turpitude of any to be found in the long catalogue of human offences, to attempt the subversion of the Government.

According to the English law, if our Revolution had not succeeded, it would have been called rebellion; and Washington, in those days, would have undergone that punishment; and English political writers would have considered him guilty of the greatest moral turpitude. So with respect to every effort to change the Government—if it does not succeed, it is rebellion; if it succeeds, it is a revolution; but its condition, in the eyes of God and man, is the same, whether it succeeds or not; for it depends on the degree of oppression and on the real object of the persons attempting the revolution. That is what constitutes the offence, not these punishments nor this attempt to make it moral turpitude. I contended in my remarks the other day, that political offenders—persons offending against the laws of the country by attempting to make a revolution when they are oppressed, were not now in the class of those who are guilty of moral turpitude; that no nation under heaven now classes them with thieves, robbers, and murderers; and that because we should interfere for the pardon of such men, it did not therefore follow, that we should enter into the long catalogue of human offences, and ask for the pardon of every one guilty of them. Why, I think the English Government has not shed a drop of blood for a treasonable political offence for a quarter of a century—perhaps for a third of a century. Look at the progress of events in France. For many a long year not a single drop of blood was shed there for political offences. Political offences there are recognized as not calling for the effusion of human blood, and as not being attended with moral turpitude. Therefore I said the other day, that they were indeed offences against existing laws, but yet were not viewed in the same light with other crimes; and in saying that I said just what is the opinion of the age; and I now repeat, that the turpitude—that the condition of the offender against the laws depends entirely on the state of the country, and on his object in endeavoring to make a change in the Government.

My honorable friend from North Carolina has supposed two or three cases. I shall not go into them in detail, for I remarked the other day, that when just such a case as this happens, and the British Government has the same natural interest in interceding as we have in this case, I, for one, shall be very happy to hear and listen to them. But what similarity is there between the case supposed by the honorable Senator and this case? Suppose the Christiana rioters had been found guilty of treason: what kind of treason would it have been? Not the treason of which Washington was guilty; not the treason of which Kossuth was guilty; not the treason of which O'Brien was guilty; not that treason which shakes governments and establishes republics; but constructive treason, by which the effort to put down a particular law, not aimed at the government at all, is construed to be treason. I go for no such purpose as that. I would say to England, that that is not the class of offences in which the offenders are relieved from moral turpitude in the eyes of the world.

Again: the honorable Senator seems to presuppose, that because we apply to England to procure a pardon for these gentlemen, therefore, if she applies to us in any extreme case, we must do the same thing. Why, we are just as free to act before as after; she is just as free to act before as after, and after as before. We say, that under the circumstances in which these Irishmen were convicted, and a large portion of our people being their countrymen, taking a deep interest in their fate, we ask the British Government to extend its clemency to them. They refuse it or they grant it. If they make us a request, not based on the same circumstances at all, are we bound to grant it? No, sir. It imposes no kind of obligation on us to grant it; and yet, from the tenor of the remarks of my honorable friend, it would seem as though he bases his argument on the fact, that if we apply to England and she grants our request under these circumstances, we must grant any request she may make under any circumstances. I totally disclaim any such idea, and I did it in my speech the other day, and I repeat it now. If we make this application in this manner to England, she is just as free to act against the application as for it; and we are just as free to act in any case for or against an application as though this case had never occurred. That is my view of it.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I am extremely obliged to my friend from Michigan for alluding to an article which has been published, because it gives me an opportunity of saying, that as I am not a subscriber to that paper, and do not take it, I have never seen the article. I have only one or two remarks to make further.

The honorable Senator seems to suppose that it is a very grievous crime for men to assemble and to associate themselves together for the purpose of preventing the execution of one of the laws of a Government, but that the parties concerned would at once lose the character of men influenced by immoral motives if their object was to put an end to all the laws, and destroy the whole authority of the Government.

The argument of the honorable gentleman is this: that assembling together and concerting by force to prevent the execution of one law is not a political offence to which the public opinion of mankind does not annex criminality and moral turpitude; but if the object be to put down all the laws of the Government, and to destroy its authority, then the parties concerned in it lose the character of moral offenders, and are only offenders against the municipal law, untainted with moral turpitude. There cannot be any such distinction as that.

The honorable Senator referred to the case of Washington and his associates. Surely the vindication of Washington from moral turpitude does not arise from the fact that he was engaged in an enterprise to put down the authority of the British Government here. It arose from the fact that he was engaged in it, with his fellow-countrymen, from justifiable reasons and for ends that in themselves made a resort to force for that purpose allowable and justifiable. Therefore the honorable Senator's argument has nothing to do in refuting the reasons which I submitted to the Senate. My reasons were not founded at all upon any determination of the question whether or not Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Mitchell, and their associates, had or had not justifiable grounds for the proceeding which they adopted to separate Ireland from her present connection with Great Britain. Not at all. My argument is this: Great Britain did not think so; the English Government did not think so; that Government considered them as not only engaged in an unlawful enterprise, but an enterprise of wickedness; because in their view it was an enterprise by which the United Kingdom, and Ireland itself, would have been, if not destroyed, greatly injured; and that inasmuch as the sovereign of Great Britain having caused these gentlemen to be prosecuted for an offence which she deemed to be a grave one, and they having been convicted of that offence, were sentenced to the punishment of death, and that punishment commuted to banishment from their country, the British Government would regard us as interposing in behalf of men who do not merit such interposition. That Government cannot recognize these gentlemen as being noble patriots, engaged in doing what was for the good of their country, and what it was an act of glorious self-sacrifice in them to endeavor to achieve. If it recognizes that character, why have they been sent to Van Dieman's Land? If the Queen of England looked upon them as possessing the character which the honorable Senator attributes to them—and very justly, for aught I know, I have no jurisdiction over that question and shall express no opinion upon it—she had as full power to pardon as she had to transmute the punishment; and therefore the consequence is as I have shown, and which nothing has been said to weaken the force of, that our interference here would justify the interposition of Great Britain in behalf of just such offenders as the Christiana rioters, if they had been convicted of high treason against this country. I think that if such an application had been made, that Government would scarcely have recognized the force and validity of the distinction which is assigned by the honorable Senator from Michigan. What would that reason be? "We asked you to interfere in behalf of Smith O'Brien and his associates because they were high and meritorious men, and only sought to destroy the Constitution of the United Empire, to throw off the connection and destroy the dependence now existing between the parts of that mighty Empire. That was all they attempted, therefore it was a proper case for our interposition; but in this case, these men did not seek to destroy the Government and Constitution of the country; they only sought to prevent the execution of one of its laws; and therefore they are such great offenders that it is utterly intolerable that you should be allowed to interpose your good offices in their behalf, or, at all events, that these good offices can receive the favorable consideration of this Government."

There is nothing in the distinction which the Senator urges, which can have any application to the objections which I have raised. I do not undertake to decide the question whether Smith O'Brien and his associates were right or wrong. I will assume, for the purpose of this discussion, that they were right; that their country was laboring under intolerable oppression; and that it was at once their right and their duty to employ force, in order to deliver her from the tyrannical conduct of her oppressors across the Channel. Assuming that, how completely will it be retorted upon us in the supposed events to which I have referred, and which were once supposed likely to have happened? And how easily may Great Britain return upon us, and say, that these were noble and generous spirits; vindicators of oppressed humanity, rushing forward at their personal hazard, without any individual interest in the question, and sacrificing their all to prevent those who had escaped from an unjust and barbarous servitude from being restored to the dominion of their masters. If we set this example, we shall have no right, as I conceive, to consider it an improper interference on the part of the Government of Great Britain, if, under the circumstances I have mentioned, she should interpose her good offices.

The honorable Senator says that he knows nothing about the spirit of the age for the last fifty years, who does not understand that political offences are no longer regarded as accompanied by moral turpitude. I do not understand that any such proposition has gone forth to the world. We all know this: that political offences are looked upon as very venial by all nations in the world, except those against which they are committed. But does the Czar of Russia look upon a political offence against his crown and government as accompanied with no moral criminality? Does England, as in this very case of the exiles in Van Dieman's Land? Does France, under the model Republic, in which has terminated the glorious consolidation of liberty with the name of democracy, over which we sung our jubiliates a few years ago? Does her Government look upon those offences in that light? Does her government look upon political offences as matters of trivial concern, not accompanied with moral culpability? Why are the vessels of the French marine now put into requisition for the purpose of carrying away hundreds and thousands of the citizens of the French nation—I had almost said Republic? We know that some of the best and most excellent people of that country have been deported to penal colonies—banished from their country. The States against which political offences are committed, never regard them in the light which the Senator supposes. There may occur cases in the history of such Governments in which the formal guilt of the political offence is complete, while what is supposed to be the essence of the crime is wanting; and when these cases occur the Government shows it by extending a pardon, or discontinuing the prosecution, or passing it over.

I wish it to be understood, in conclusion, that my objection to this measure is not founded on the determined, or asserted, or intimated ground, that these unfortunate gentlemen were morally criminal; that they were not politically justifiable; that the condition of things did not warrant, and even require, them to resort to force to accomplish the object which they had in view. Not at all. On that I give no opinion. But my objection is this: we think many of them worthy subjects of sympathy—noble patriots entitled to liberty. England does not think so, or she would liberate them. Then we interpose, because we have a view, with regard to their case, different from that taken by the English Government. Then it is reasonable that, when political offences may be committed here, the English Government has precisely the same right to interpose, by their good offices, in behalf of those whom that Government may recognize as champions of humanity—as noble and choice spirits of the earth—but whom our laws condemn to severe and condign punishment. That is my objection.

Mr. CASS. The Senate will pardon me while I say a word more. I wish to go back to my original proposition, which is precisely this: That any oppressed people, when they strive to change their government—whether the result of their effort be revolution or rebellion—are not guilty of moral turpitude in the eyes of God and man. That is my proposition; and that is the prevalent opinion at the present day. Otherwise you make the criminality dependent entirely upon the event. And you can make no catalogue which will not include Washington and his countrymen, and all that host of patriots who devoted their lives and fortunes to the service of their country. That is my proposition.

My honorable friend asks: For what were these men sent to Van Dieman's Land, if they were not guilty of moral turpitude?

Mr. BADGER. I did not ask any such question.

Mr. CASS. I understood my honorable friend also to allude to the case of France, in support of his proposition. I can tell him why men have been sent from France. It is because Louis Napoleon has got the power; and no man will say that such men as young Lafayette and L'Estare were guilty of moral turpitude.

Mr. BADGER. I never said so.

Mr. CASS. I am happy that I was mistaken. I supposed that my friend went upon the ground, that there was moral turpitude because these men were sent away. It was simply an act of power; nothing less, nothing more.

Mr. BADGER. The honorable Senator persists very strangely in misstating what I say. I know he does not design it.

Mr. CASS. Certainly not.

Mr. BADGER. I have given no expression of my opinion on the question of moral turpitude. I have said over and over again, that I gave no opinion on any such matter. I say that the Governments against which political offences are committed do not regard political offenders as being patriots influenced by high and lofty motives, and worthy of consideration and regard. They look upon them as criminals, and therefore punish them. That is what I have said, and all that I have said on that point. My argument is entirely dependent on that, as I have endeavored to explain more than once. It depends on the proposition which I have stated, and now restate, that if we interfere in behalf of those whom another Government deems worthy of punishment, because we think them excellent persons, deserving no punishment, they may interfere in regard to persons they may deem engaged in laudable efforts to set aside our laws for the purpose of setting up a higher system in obedience to the higher law, though we deem them criminals, and wish to subject them to the severest punishment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not mean to enter into this debate on the present occasion, and I shall not make any remarks of my own. Since I made a few remarks on Saturday last, I have received a letter from a gentleman whose opinions I think this Senate will respect. He is a Southern gentleman, and perhaps as sensitive in relation to Southern rights as my honorable friend from North Carolina. I at one time felt disposed to touch upon this very point. Were I a Southern man, I should be proud of it; but certainly, with all respect for the South, I should hesitate as to the propriety of bringing in that very sensitive question upon all occasions. I should not feel that I was estopped from expressing my sympathy with the unfortunate, because I happened to be a Southern man. But I do not mean to touch on that point.

Here is a letter which I have received from a highly cultivated Southern gentleman—a Virginian, who represented this country at the Court of St. James. Permit me to say, that while there, no man ever represented this country at that Court, or at any other Court, who was more sensitive as to this very question. I very well recollect, that at one time a difficulty arose between him and a very powerful man of the times and of the occasion—Mr. O'Connell—on some question of this kind. I ask that the letter may be read, because I think that he presents the matter about as forcibly as it could be presented in a speech.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

GEORGETOWN, February 7th, 1852.

MY DEAR SIR: I regret that I was unable to get to the Senate Chamber this morning to hear the whole of your admirable speech upon the resolution in behalf of O'Brien and his associates. What I did hear, gave me great pleasure, and did you high honor, not only as a man and Irishman, but as an American Senator. I hope to see your speech fully reported, and might ask the favor of you to send me a copy to Manchester, South Carolina, where I am going for a few weeks, on a visit. I was forcibly struck by the picture you drew of Ireland and her present situation, in connection with Great Britain. It was eloquently, ably, and faithfully done; and nothing can be more true, than the opinion you expressed, as to the effect of your resolution, and the course and policy of the British Government on the subject of it. If it passes Congress, it will lead to the immediate relief of those unfortunate men, I venture to say. The Ministry will seize upon it as the means of extending clemency and mercy, which, without it, they might feel some difficulty in doing. The true policy now, of England, is to conciliate Ireland; to compose the dissensions of the Irish people, not to fan the embers of subdued rebellion and agitation; not to array Protestant against Catholic, and Catholic against Protestant; but by uniting all classes of the population of this ill-fated country around the Constitution, and extending mercy to her deluded and misguided people. Justice is satisfied, and the laws vindicated. The great Repealer and Agitator is in his grave. He and his memory are buried, and his despotic power and boundless popularity have vanished with him. The great masses now, on both sides the Channel, believe that union with Great Britain is essential to the freedom and resurrection of Ireland; certainly to its future greatness. Instead, then, of prosecutions and chains and gibbets, England knows and feels that it is by kindness and justice and clemency, that the Irish nation are to be governed and deemed worthy of being the ally of a mighty Empire. God and nature have made the two countries essential to each other, and a final separation would be fatal to each. This is my opinion, and I have some right to form it, from a knowledge of both. I know, too, that many of the wisest and best men in England and Ireland concur in this opinion. I hope that the resolution will pass, and that all the benefits you anticipate may result from it.

Very truly and respectfully, your friend and obedient servant,
A. STEVENSON.

General J. SHIELDS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have taken the liberty of having that letter read, because this gentleman, who is well acquainted with diplomatic propriety, seems to regard this as wholly harmless in this respect. He is well acquainted, too, with the disposition of the English Government, and with the condition of the English and Irish people.

With respect to the amendments to my amendment which have been submitted by the Senator from New York, I am quite willing to accept them, if it can be done consistently with the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator cannot accept them. The question is on amending the amendment as proposed.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I listened with very great pleasure, on a former day, to the remarks which fell from the Senator from Illinois, who stands here now, I believe, the immediate patron of this resolution. None can doubt that the interest which he takes in this subject, besides the general interest actuating an American statesman, is of a character peculiar and appropriate to himself; and he has presented this resolution, and has sustained it in a manner which, while it reflects credit on him as a statesman, does even greater credit to his heart than his head. It is not my design at all to enter into the merits of these propositions, further than to express my opinion of its policy. It is a measure of kindred character with the one that was discussed yesterday by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass.] It is a measure which commits this Government to a step never heretofore taken; to an interference—a direct interference—with the policy of foreign Governments. It is in that light alone that I am permitted, as a Senator from one of these States, to look at it, and to consider it. However freely I acknowledge that the most deep and earnest sympathies of the American people are with these men, whom we justly call patriots, now in exile from their fatherland, I feel bound to declare that this Government is forbidden from interference.

Sir, we have seen lately a gentleman from abroad here, on a self-accredited mission to this country, for the purpose of unsettling its policy in relation to foreign Governments. We have seen the countenance he has met with from men of every degree and every station. We have seen, I fear, that he has made a deep impression upon the feelings of a portion of the American people as to that foreign policy; and we have witnessed the fact, that thousands have hung listeners to him when he has attempted to show them that Washington, who laid the foundations of this policy deep and broad, was mistaken; and who listened to him when he told them, that although he was aware the Government was against a change in that policy, he was equally aware that the people could control the Government; and he declared and avowed that he was here to induce the American people to overrule the Government—in what? In a matter of policy in relation to foreign nations, which has never been departed from since Washington promulgated it.

I have heard with great and deep regret, that the justly-distinguished Senator from Michigan, whose words almost carry the weight of authority before the American people, has told us, as late as yesterday, that we had need of no fear in taking the step which he recommended; that it would not lead to war; but that it would exercise a moral and suasive influence on things abroad; and he cited numerous instances where foreign Governments had expressed their opinions of the intended actions of others, and we had seen them carried into execution, and yet they stood silent and inactive. What were these foreign Governments? They were the Governments of kings and potentates; of princes, who were actuated by selfish considerations alone in whatever they suggested or recommended to those around them. What is our Government? A Government of the people. And is it to be believed, will it be credited, that it should be recommended to the American people, in wielding this Government, to declare a purpose which they do not mean to execute? Sir, the very man to whom I have alluded—the Hungarian—avowed in one of his public addresses, that although it was not intended that the policy which he recommended should lead to war, yet it was true that it became a nation, as he expressed it, to back its diplomacy with the power of the country.

I did not intend when I rose to discuss these questions. They are kindred. However little allied in fact or in purpose, they are of kindred origin, and will lead to kindred results. I may feel it to be a duty devolved upon me, before the measure discussed yesterday shall be brought to a final vote, to express my opinions at length upon this subject. I meant only now to express more particularly to the Senator from Illinois, the feeling of regret with which I am constrained to vote against the proposition which he has so ably sustained. I shall feel it to be my duty, with whatever reluctance, at once to vote in the negative, if it shall come to a vote. But I should be better satisfied, entertaining the feeling I do entertain towards the gentlemen in whose behalf it has originated, that it should be laid on the table. If not unacceptable to him, I make that motion.

Mr. SHIELDS. Unless some one is disposed to speak on the subject, I would like to have the resolution disposed of at once. I think that, generally speaking, the longer these questions are kept in suspense, the worse feeling arises out of them. Hence I would like to see the resolution disposed of now. But I must state, that I cannot, in justice to myself, accede to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Virginia, and allow the resolution to be laid on the table.

Mr. MASON. I will not insist on the motion, if it is unacceptable to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am highly gratified with the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia. The resolutions offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] in reference to the question of intervention, and this resolution of the Senator from Illinois, are certainly kindred subjects. They have their origin in the same feelings growing out of recent events. I think it will become the Senate, as the discussion is to go on upon the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island, to postpone action upon this resolution, until we have heard the discussion upon the whole subject. I do not wish to interfere with my friend from Illinois in his movement at all, but I wanted to throw myself upon his courtesy, to know whether it would not meet his approbation that the resolution might lie over until we get through the discussion of the subject which was under consideration yesterday. It seems to me that it would be better to get through the whole discussion before we vote. I feel disposed to make some remarks upon these subjects before we finally dispose of them; but I am not prepared to make those remarks now, and I do not wish the question to be taken at this time.

Several Senators expressed a desire to adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, then, without wishing to take the floor on the resolution, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, as it is past three o'clock. Perhaps when the subject comes up again, we shall be able to make some disposition of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 11, 1852.

The House met pursuant to adjournment. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

Mr. STRATTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, and that they be read, laid on the table, and printed.

There being no objection, the preamble and resolutions were read, as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States is a compact between the several States, and forms the basis of our Federal Union:

And whereas the said States, through their Representatives, in sovereign capacities as States, by adopting said Constitution, conceded only such powers to the General Government as were necessary "to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and posterity;"

And whereas the questions which agitated the country, and absorbed so large a portion of the time of the last session of the Congress of the United States; questions in their nature directly opposed to the spirit and compromises of the Constitution, calculated to destroy our domestic tranquillity, and dismember our glorious Union, were happily terminated by the Compromise Measures, it is deemed the imperative duty of this Legislature to express their sentiments in relation thereto: Therefore,

1. Resolved, (Senate concurring,) That the Constitution of the United States was framed in the spirit of wisdom and compromise, is the bond of our Federal Union, and can only be preserved by a strict adherence to its express and implied powers; that New Jersey, one of the original thirteen States, has always adhered to the Constitution, and is unalienably attached to the Union, and that she will resist, to the extent of her ability, any infraction of that sacred instrument.

2. Resolved, (Senate concurring,) That this Legislature cordially approves the measures adopted by the last session of Congress, known as the "Compromise Measures," and that every patriot, in every part of our widely extended country, has cause to rejoice in the adoption of said measures, as a triumph of constitutional rights over a spirit of wild and disorganizing fanaticism.

3. Resolved, (Senate concurring,) That New Jersey will abide by and sustain the compromise measures, and that her Senators in the Senate of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to resist any change, alteration, or repeal thereof.

4. Resolved, (Senate concurring,) That the fugitive slave law is in accordance with the stipulations of the Constitution of the United States, and, in its provisions, carries out the spirit and letter of the Constitution in its compromises, upon which our Union is founded.

5. Resolved, (Senate concurring,) That we approve of the patriotic stand taken by the Executive of the United States, in declaring his determination to execute and enforce all laws constitutionally enacted, and that the people of New Jersey will sustain him in so doing.

6. Resolved, (Senate concurring,) That the Governor of the State be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the Governor of each State in the Union, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Is not the question of printing debatable?

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. But the question to lie upon the table is not.

The SPEAKER. The question of printing, in the opinion of the Chair, is debatable.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Upon that question, then, I have the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the question, in its present condition, is not debatable. The motion to print, when connected with the motion to lie upon the table, is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The motion to print is debatable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The questions can only be separated by the House. The gentleman cannot debate the question of printing unless separated from the motion to lie upon the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If the gentleman from Tennessee rises to a point of order, I wish he would state it.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to lay the resolutions upon the table, and ordering them to be printed.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Upon the latter motion I have a word to say.

Mr. JONES. It is a joint motion, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot debate the motion to lie upon the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not ask that, but to make a few remarks upon the question of printing.

The SPEAKER. So long as the questions are connected they are not debatable.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I then ask for a division of them.

Mr. JONES. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is competent for the gentleman to call for a separate vote, first upon the motion to lie upon the table, and next upon the motion to print.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio. I intended to endeavor to get the floor as soon as these resolutions should be disposed of, for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, to take up for consideration the President's message. Then he can make whatever remarks he desires.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am very much pleased to hear that. I have waited almost three months for that motion. I shall not surrender the floor which I legitimately possess upon the question of printing.

Mr. JONES. I understand the motion originally to have been a joint one—to lay upon the table and print. I say this motion cannot be divided at the instance of one member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it competent for the gentleman to call for a division—to have a separate vote upon each proposition.

Mr. JONES. The question of division should be put to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the propositions are divisible; that a member has a right to call for the separation, and that it is not necessary a vote shall be taken upon the division.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There can be no doubt about it.

The question was taken upon the motion to lay the resolutions upon the table, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to print.

Mr. ORR. I rise to a question of order. Inasmuch as the House have laid the resolution upon the table, no motion to print, or any other motion in connection with the subject, can be entertained until the resolutions are taken from the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman, upon the ground that it has been the practice of the House to order a paper which may have been laid upon the table to be printed.

Mr. ORR. I understand the Chair to decide, then, that it is competent for the House to consider a motion to print a proposition which has been laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides the question now before the House is upon the motion to print.

Mr. ORR. To print resolutions that have been laid upon the table?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ORR. I then take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HALL moved to lay the appeal upon the table.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS asked the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw certain papers from the files of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. HEBARD asked the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the papers of Stephen Hoyt from the files of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Nothing is further from my intention than to occupy the time of the House upon the question to which I call their attention. I wish to say to the House and the country, that I, for one, am one of those now present who profess to be Free-Soilers. We are ready now, and at all times, to discuss the questions of the compromise, as they shall come legitimately before us. This determination upon my part was avowed upon the first day of the session. I had hoped that we should have had the privilege of going into a discussion of the President's message, and there laying our views before the country, to whom we are bound to address ourselves upon this and every other important question. Let me say to the House, without intending any disrespect to members here, that, instead of adjourning and spending something like five weeks of our session, had we come here and laid our views, in a statesman-like manner, before the country and before this body, we should have improved ourselves in statesmanship, and we should now have the respect of the people. We should have respected ourselves better than we now do, having spent so much of our time in idleness. That time has gone by, and we cannot now recall it. And now, when business presses, we shall see gentlemen rising upon this floor and avowing their sentiments upon important questions, which should have long since been discussed upon the President's message. The resolutions from the respected State of New Jersey are before us, and what is the position in which they place us all? Already the people of New Jersey, through their Legislature, are avowing their sentiments in favor of these compromise measures, while we, the representatives of the people of this nation in Congress assembled, are not permitted to speak on the subject, or to manifest our views, or our intentions, in regard to these measures. These are called compromise measures, by which the great question of slavery is to be silenced forever. I would say to the Legislature of New Jersey, Send your resolutions to the other branch of Congress. Send them, where almost from the first day of our present session down to the present, the agitation has been going on upon this very question of suppressing agitation—of silencing discussion upon slavery. That State is sending to us their determination of maintaining silence upon this question, while they proclaim to the world their intention to uphold the fugitive law, and the slave trade in this District, and on our southern coast. Far be it from me to object to the printing of these resolutions. The Legislature of New Jersey is certainly entitled to our respect, and so are all other Legislatures. What I protest against, is this side-bar manner, this insidious mode of arguing questions from Legislatures, and from people of different States, while we ourselves hermetically close our own lips upon the question. I will not do it for one. They speak in favor of the fugitive slave law; and let me say here, that with these resolutions I agree most heartily, so far as they go for maintaining the Constitution of the United States. I stand with them in that respect. And I am the last man to flinch from this position. Would to God that that State, by her representatives upon this floor, would sustain the Constitution. When I say that, I say what you know well to be my sentiments; and they are, that this body has nothing to do with this question of slavery in the States—that every attempt upon the part of this Government to involve us in a discussion of this question is now, ever has been, and ever will be, a violation of our constitutional rights. Hands off! Non-intervention! Keep your slavery to yourselves! Is the motto of the advocates of freedom from the North. It is your business—it is your institution, with all its curse, shame, and iniquity, or its glory, whatever you call it. It is your business and not ours. Involve us not in it—keep it to yourselves—maintain it; but do not involve the freemen of my State, or of the free States, in it. I will take this occasion to repeat what I have often said upon this floor, that in one instance, and but one, under the Constitution of the United States, are we authorized to legislate upon the question of slavery, and that is the question for the recapture of fugitive slaves; and upon that question I am willing to give to the South everything that the framers of the Constitution gave them at the time of its formation, or rather, I shall urge no constitutional objection to such legislation. But when I have done that, I then take my stand; I move no further. Thus far slavery, with its proud waves, may come; but when gentlemen go beyond that, I meet them. I know how gentlemen came here with prejudice on their minds—I know the misrepresentations that have gone through this nation in regard to my sentiments, and the sentiments of those who advocate Northern rights. Slaveholders, Southern men, Northern men, men of all parties have read our sentiments, distorted, misrepresented, and falsified, and it becomes necessary at every new session of Congress, that we should avow our doctrines. I do so now to Southern men; and I assure gentlemen from the South, that if they come up to the work and stand by the Constitution, we will meet them upon its very line, and will stand with them shoulder to shoulder, and we will act as friends on that point. Let us repeal your laws involving us in the support of slavery.

The Congress of the United States never had the privilege or constitutional authority to involve the people of the North in the maintenance of slavery, or of your slave trade. I say to you, one and all, members of this body, that where you attempt to involve us in the crimes and iniquities of that institution, or of the slave trade, you can never settle this question—you might as easily unsettle the eternal, enduring principles of justice, or tear Deity from his throne, as to settle this question while the freemen of the North are involved in the crimes of this slave trade.

But here we stand, and why? Look at the slave trade in this District—at your slave prisons in this District, sustained by laws of Congress, by which fathers, mothers, brothers and sisters, are now sighing, weeping in chains, and the Legislature of New Jersey sends up resolutions that we shall remain involved in this transcendent iniquity, and sustain this market in human flesh, and authorize the sale of fathers and mothers in this city by act of Congress; that your Southern coastwise slave trade shall continue, and the flag of the United States shall be prostituted to maintain and protect a commerce in the bodies of men and of women; that the American stars and stripes shall float over cargoes of mothers, fathers, and children, by virtue of an act of Congress, and yet say we shall remain silent upon the subject. I will take this occasion to say, that I have prepared a bill, of which I gave notice early in the session, to repeal the 9th and 10th sections of the law of 1801, which constituted and established this coastwise slave trade. We do not ask to interfere with it. We ask to wipe it from the statute-book, and leave your slave trade where we found it, with the people of the slave States themselves. Why, sir, the Legislature of New Jersey asks us to be quiet—to regard their compromise measures as a final settlement of the slave question. Do they wish their constituents and themselves to continue involved in the enormities of that traffic in mankind? I would like to hear gentlemen meet these points, not to evade, dodge, or cover them up, but to meet these questions in a frank, open manner, like men—like statesmen. Here are the statutes.

Now, when I come to offer my bill, which I intend doing, I want to know how many of these men, from the North and from the South, will vote to separate the North from the support of that coastwise slave trade? Let the representatives of New Jersey say, as stated in the resolutions before us, that we have no power over it; that we never had power over it—and I shall agree with them. I desire now to address one word to the slaveholding portion of this House. When I shall present this bill, it will give a fair opportunity for gentlemen to meet with us here and test this question, and settle it forever by washing our hands of it. I expect there will be a mighty "coming down stairs" about that time. But I desire to unite with the slaveholding portion of this body—for there is some generosity with them, at least they have boldness—and we will smoke out these dough-faces, and drive them from under the bush! [Laughter.] Now, I repeat to Southern men, that I look to them with confidence, that they will meet us upon the question fairly, and come up to the work, and permit me to introduce my bill to repeal that law. Let it be understood, I repeat, that there is nothing in that bill which seeks to interfere. It is to cease all interference and repeal the law; not to pass a new law, but to prevent future agitation, to leave all interference with the slave trade, and leave it with the South, where it belongs. This, I believe, is what New Jersey wants. I go with the people of that State to effect this object. I go with every man in this Hall who has spoken upon this subject to effect this repeal, and thereby prevent agitation. I go with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Murray,] when he said we had no authority to carry slavery where it is not. He then, sir, spoke truth. I agree with him, although he is a Democrat and a slaveholder—no, I believe he is a Democratic Union man. But the truth is this: When we come to this work gentlemen retreat from their positions. It is the only subject on which we are authorized, under the Constitution, to legislate concerning slavery. On that subject we possess powers to legislate to a certain extent.

We can prohibit Northern men from preventing you from the capture of your slaves, and that far I am willing to go with you; rather, I would say, there is no constitutional objection to that. That is my doctrine. We have no constitutional objection to fixing a penalty upon any man who shall interfere to prevent the slaveholder from arresting and returning his fugitive slaves. But there I stop. The State of New Jersey, by her Legislature, may proclaim that it is our duty to take upon ourselves the appointment of officers of commissioners to run after and seize your slaves for you, but I deny that position altogether. We have no constitutional authority thus to degrade Northern men. Let me say to Southern men, it is your privilege to catch your own slaves, if any one catches them. It is not our duty to play the blood-hound for you. It is your duty to meet the expense of it, and not ours. We will not tax our constituents, our laboring men, to defray the expense of chasing down and securing your fugitives. Catch them yourselves. You have a constitutional right to do it; but we will not turn out and play the blood-hound for you. When you ask us to pay the expense of arresting your slaves, or to give the President authority to appoint officers to do that dirty work, give them power to compel our people to give chase to the panting bondman, you overstep the bounds of the Constitution; and there we meet you, and there we stand. And there we shall remain. We shall protest against such indignity; we shall proclaim our abhorrence of such a law. Nor can you seal our lips, or silence our voices. Do you believe that Northern men are ready and willing to surrender their self-respect, their dignity, and pay the expenses of giving chase to your fugitive slaves? If so, let me tell you that there is a sentiment now passing through the whole North, and through the whole Union, that will set your calculations at defiance. You cannot quiet it. Like Banquo's ghost, it will not down at your bidding. Sir, the popular sentiment of this nation hurls defiance at this weak and effeminate body, when it undertakes to tell the people that they shall surrender their consciences at your bidding, and engage in the vile work of seizing their fellow-man, and dragging him to bondage and oppression.

I had no intention, when I rose, of saying more than to enter my protest against the manner of interfering here on all sides of this question except upon that of freedom, and that while we, the representatives of the North, remain silent, the States, through their Legislatures, should be permitted to argue this question, and send their arguments to the people. Having uttered my protest on that point, I will resume my seat.

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman from Ohio has given the House some advice as to how we are to improve our statesmanship. If I understand him correctly, he lectures us for adjourning over from Fridays till Mondays instead of staying here to listen to the disquisitions which he is in the habit of pouring out, whenever he gets the floor, upon one subject, with a view to improve our statesmanship. Now, how long is it since the gentleman became so industrious that he undertakes to lecture this House about improving our statesmanship? Let the dinner-bell ring, and the first gentleman that leaves this Hall to go home and appease his appetite, to the neglect of the business of the country, is the gentleman from Ohio. He is as punctual in that respect as any steam-whistle in a factory in the city, or as any bell in town. Who left Congress at the last long session before he had performed his public duties here, and went off home after he had poured out all he had to say upon the subject of slavery, leaving everything in disorder, so far as the nation was concerned, and regardless of what befell the country, but the gentleman from Ohio? And now those of us who have business of our constituents to attend to on Saturday—the holiday, as it is called, but the most laborious day of the session to those members who do their business properly—are to be lectured by the gentleman from Ohio, who leaves punctually at dinner-time, and goes home for three weeks at a time, leaving the public business to attend to itself. "Take the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to take the mote out of thy brother's eye."

Mr. GIDDINGS, (interrupting.) So far as regards my dinner hour—whether I go to my dinner at one, two, or three o'clock—the gentleman regards it as important to the country. He, sir, may regard it as the most tremendous subject on which he has been called to comment in the course of his statesmanship. I shall only reply by saying, that I dine at such hours as suits my mind. I had not consulted the gentleman. I am in the habit of dining regularly and laboring regularly, unless business prohibits. I had not regarded it as my duty to consult any one as to my hours of eating.

As far as regards my absence at the close of the last long session, I will say to the gentleman, that no vote was taken then, or ever during my absence, on which my voice or vote could have had the least possible effect, or could have been of any avail. I did leave Washington a few days before the close of the long session of the last Congress; but I did not leave until every subject of legislation was as substantially determined as they now are. This House had spent seven long months in the discussion of one question, and it was impossible to bring the dough-faces to a vote upon it. I refer to the California bill. When that bill had been under discussion three weeks, I called upon gentlemen from the North and from the South to meet in this Hall and devise means by which we could drive the dough-faces to a vote. And, sir, we had some forty or fifty members here, but we found it impossible to move them up to the work. The discussion was prolonged and prolonged, and for more than half a year we were detained here by the timidity of members—kept from our business at home, from our families, and the treasure of the nation squandered, for no other reason than that members dared not vote on that question.

Mr. STANLEY. Has the gentleman finished yet?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have not quite got through. I am sorry to see a Southern slaveholder doing the dirty work of the dough-faces of the North. It is not becoming the dignity of a slaveholder to draw such argument from the servile press of Northern dough-faces. I have seen this whole attack of his, in certain scurrilous papers of the North. Sir, let the dough-faces copy after Southern gentlemen. It is their business. I wish now to meet another important question. I have been censured by the servile press of my own district, because I did not, by my own influence, carry through at an earlier period of last Congress the bill for the improvement of our lakes, harbors, and river navigation. The loss of that bill has been imputed to my neglect. Now, before this House and the country, I ask the gentleman, and every other member of the last Congress, to bear testimony, that I used every possible exertion to hasten the business of that session. From the commencement of the session to its close, I never voted for an adjournment over for more than one day. From the commencement of this session, I have not objected to adjourning over on Saturdays, but I have objected to spending half our time here for the first eight weeks of the session in idleness. That is what I have objected to; and if the gentleman means to censure me for that, let him come out and say so like a man. I spoke respectfully. I stated expressly that I did not intend to censure any one. That, sir, was the first time that I ever found the gentleman from North Carolina dodging behind the bush. When he was a good Whig in former times, and acted with me, he used to come out like a man on every and all occasions, and speak, and act, and vote without delay. I repeated at the long session of last Congress, that instead of speaking here for seven months upon the one question of admitting California, we should have disposed of it in three weeks at furthest, and then have passed our harbor bill, and that instead of remaining here, that gentleman, and all of us, should have gone home at least two or three months earlier than we did. In that way we would have had our harbor and river improvements, saved the nation a great expense, and ourselves the disgrace of such puerile and unnecessary waste of time and money.

Is there a Whig, or a Democrat, or a dough-face, who was in the last Congress, who can tell for what—"cui bono"—we remained here for those seven months? As I said before, my voice was to labor, to act, to legislate, to do our business, and go home. And now I come right home to the point—will the gentleman meet it? Ought we not to have done as I state? Ought we not to have given the people a harbor bill, instead of wasting our time? Ought we not to have disposed of the California question in at most three weeks, instead of being seven months about it? and then passed the harbor bill in another week? Ought not the gentleman himself to have aided in doing this, and then gone home at least two or three months before he did, instead of attacking me for going so early? Let the people answer this question. Why, I believe opinions are given very freely here. At home I have to pay for them; but here I give them for nothing. I believe the country would have been under deep obligations to the gentleman, and to the rest of the House, if they had left when I did. I believe it would have been better for the country if we had transacted our business and returned home to our constituents at least two months earlier than we did. Let me say, here, that I see gentlemen in this Hall who are looking forward to the nomination of a President; and let me warn the country that until those nominations have been made, and until the Buncombe speeches shall have been uttered, little business will be done, and no adjournment had.

Mr. STANLEY. This lecture is getting too long.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Well, I see the gentleman is impatient under it, so I will give way.

Mr. STANLEY. I yielded the floor to the gentleman for explanation, but he branched off into a long lecture to the House upon its general deportment. If I yield any longer, it may go on for a week, for the gentleman seems to think he has some special gift from Providence, or from someone much lower than I choose to refer to here, to lecture all mankind—slave-holders, dough-faces, Whigs and Democrats.

The gentleman from Ohio admits, that he went home during the last Congress, and neglected the public business. We heard none of his lectures then. Who aided so much to delay the public business in this House as the gentleman from Ohio? What ten men aided so much to do it as he? Were there any ten men in that Congress who caused so much delay, and did so much to obstruct the public business, as the honorable member?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I call on the gentleman from North Carolina to make his assertion good in the face of this House. I pronounce it false.

Mr. STANLEY. It is mighty easy for one who has no regard for the decencies or dignity of life, and who screens himself from responsibility for directing false charges like this, to leave his public business here, and sneak away from this House, as the gentleman did at the end of the last long session, taking his pay for work he did not do. Is he not a pretty gentleman to come here and lecture any man in this House—any negro outside of the House—or any free negro—upon propriety and integrity of character? Does it come with a good grace for that gentleman to embark in lectures of that character?

Now, sir, we have had enough of this. Why, when the honorable gentleman some time ago made a speech in this Hall, I called upon him to explain a certain matter, and he refused, because, as he then said, it was not a proper time. Yet, how does that gentleman now regard the rules of this House? Why, here, upon a motion to print the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey he gives a half hour's discussion, not upon printing those resolutions, but upon slavery and the slave trade. What has that to do with the subject of printing the resolutions? Why, these resolutions are always printed as a matter of courtesy. But, in this case, upon a simple motion to print, we must be treated this morning to a speech upon the slavery question by this mileage member—this running-away member—this member who goes home to secure his own election, and leaves the public business to take care of itself.

The gentleman calls himself a Democrat. If he had called himself a free negro Democrat, he would have come nearer the truth than he does by calling himself a Democrat—for the Democrats will not acknowledge him as one of them. I do not know a Democrat upon this floor who would do it.

But the honorable gentleman says that his dinner hour is about as great a question of statesmanship as I ever attempted to discuss. I beg to say that I have attempted to discuss one subject of smaller significance than even his dinner, and that is the honorable gentleman from Ohio himself; and I have discussed that subject, because it was forced upon me by his own conduct in this House. He is a subject of the least importance of any that I ever attempted to discuss. Why, during the last Congress, when he ought to have been here attending to his public business, where was the gentleman? But he has seen proper to refer to this internal improvement bill. Now I say—the House will bear me out in what I say, that every member of the last Congress will bear me out in saying—that he did more to injure that bill than any fifty strict constructionists in the House. His support of anything he touches in this House is death to it. He is making slavery a popular institution, if it ever was unpopular. He is making the people of his district, by his rant upon this question of slavery, not only odious to the Southern people, but to a large portion of the North. Yes, the North are beginning to regard them, on his account, with feelings of detestation. That honorable member, by his advocacy of these internal improvement bills, as far as his influence can go, or has gone, is rendering them odious to a large portion of the people all over the country, and gives members upon this floor a pretext for voting against them, which otherwise they would not have. How can your constituents expect to have river and harbor improvements when a representative, who comes here to send forth constantly his infernal nonsense, villainess, and abuse upon the whole Southern country, undertakes to advocate such measures? Yet that has been the whole course of the honorable member.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the member allow me to say a word upon that point? I want to call the attention of the House to the vote upon the internal improvement bill. I rejoice that the honorable gentleman from North Carolina has paid me the compliment to say that I have done more than any other fifty men in this House to defeat this bill. It is saying that I possess an influence, of which I was not aware. I think—though I am not certain—that there were not fifty who voted against it in this House.

A VOICE. The bill only passed by some sixteen or seventeen majority.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Well, be that as it may, I am rejoiced that the gentleman has seen fit to call up this point. When I took my seat in this House, this whole system of internal improvements was abandoned. At that time the western portion of the district which I now represent, was represented by another gentleman. Gentlemen will recollect that the system, so far as our action was concerned, was revived during the administration of Mr. Polk. We then passed a bill which was vetoed. Now, it is for the sins of Mr. Polk for which the gentleman from North Carolina and certain Whig newspapers arraign me. At the last session of Congress, a bill was passed again, triumphantly in this House—at least it was passed by a large majority—I am sure the majority was near thirty; yet I am held responsible for the loss of the bill in the Senate. I desired to reply thus far to the charges of the gentleman. And I will add, that by the bill my district received more than double the amount of appropriation it ever received under my predecessor in any one year.

But as to other matters, I will say that when the member descends to the vulgarities of bar-room blackguards, to which he has on this occasion descended, I cannot follow him. He gets lower down than a man of honor can go. He descends so low that I cannot follow him so far as to throw the mantle of charity over him. [Laughter.] I say, I cannot, and I hope the country, as I know my constituents will not, expect me to follow him down to the point of ribaldry to which he has descended upon this occasion.

Mr. G., (turning to several gentlemen standing near Mr. STANLY.) I protest against the dough-faces crowding around the gentleman from North Carolina, to supply him with matter with which to assail me. I tell them it is too small business for men.

Mr. STANLY. That's true. It is a mighty small business. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. This is not a free fight at all. It is between him and myself. I want them to give us a free fight—fair play upon both sides.

A Voice. You shall have that.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I say that the press—the servile press of the North—has chosen to arraign me, and charge upon me the responsibility of defeating that bill, not in this House, for I repeat that it passed this body, but because my influence was not sufficient to pass it through the Senate on the last days of the session. The gentleman from North Carolina consents to be their mouth-piece, to play the bully for them. He arraigns me for that, and tells the country that I did more than any other fifty men in the House to defeat the bill. I am glad that he has given me the opportunity for laying the truth in relation to this matter before the House and the country. Now, sir, how stands the fact? I make the assertion, that it was that gentleman and the Northern serviles in the House who would not permit us to come to a vote upon the California bill, who prevented us from getting through the bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors—who would not allow it to pass this House during the long session to which he refers, nor, indeed, in the last session, in time for it to pass the Senate during that Congress. There is the whole of it. And I say, the gentleman from North Carolina, and those with him who procured that seven months' delay of all business, are the men who are responsible for the loss of that bill, and of other measures which ought to have passed that Congress.

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman from Ohio says it is a small business for anybody to come here and give hints to me in relation to himself. So it is. I plead guilty to the accusation. It is not only a very small business, but rather worse than that. It is the business of a scavenger to have anything to do with the honorable gentleman from Ohio; and I feel as if I wanted to wash my hands after I have got through with him. But I cannot help it. He is here, upon this floor, and thrusts himself upon us. He holds himself up to us as a light—as a sort of censor morum of this House. Now, in all courtesy and in all decency I say that it is a small business for me. I do not know how I can descend any lower when I descend to attack the honorable member from Ohio.

A MEMBER. "Good!" "Good!"

Mr. STANLY. It is not good; it is very bad, and I wish somebody else would do it. But when he thrusts himself before the House in this manner, I have felt called upon to do it.

A few words in regard to the charge which I made, that the gentleman from Ohio had done more toward defeating the river and harbor bill than any other fifty members in this House. I believe that bill was defeated by the influence of that member, by his violent and insupportable attacks upon Southern members and Southern institutions, while he has set himself up as the "Simon Pure" of this House. That gentleman has spoken of the large amount which that bill appropriated in his own district. Now, it is my belief that the very fact that so large an amount was appropriated for a certain portion of the country, is the very reason why the bill did not pass the Senate of the United States. "Let the galled jade wince." The facts are here, and the country ought to know them. The people of his own district ought to know the fact, that whatever measure that gentleman advocates here he renders odious.

The gentleman refers to my course upon the California bill, by way of a retort, in the spirit of mere spleen and spite, in a most contemptible spirit of "ut for tat," and regardless of truth. He says that I was responsible as much as any others, I believe, for the delay in the passage of that bill.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Oh no; I did not say that.

Mr. STANLY. Well, he says that I am responsible. Now, if there has anything come before this House in relation to which, above all others, I am impregnable, it is this charge. Every member of the last Congress will bear me witness that I was ready to come to a vote upon that California bill at all times, and that my course in this respect made me an object of assault by certain gentlemen from the Southern country. I introduced a resolution to close debate upon that bill, and tried to get it through at a much earlier period than the honorable member from Ohio himself did. I say, then, that if there is a single member upon this floor who is exempt from this charge, I am the man; for I tried my best to stop debate and get this bill reported to the House. So I am safe upon that subject.

But the honorable gentleman talks about our adjourning over from Friday to Monday. Now, I want to know where the gentleman from Ohio was during nearly a whole week of the present session, when he was absent from the House? I know where he was. He was in a Philadelphia convention. He was embarking in the Kossuth humbug. He was passing resolutions about Kossuth's influence upon the slavery questions in the United States. But he was not assisting in the discharge of the duties of this House.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. STANLY. It is evident that no member of this House wants to hear him; but I will allow him to speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman has, upon a former occasion, imputed to me a presence at a meeting of Abolitionists in Philadelphia, when certain resolutions were passed there. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. Those resolutions were not passed at the meeting at which I spoke; nor were any resolutions passed, save, perhaps, a formal vote of thanks to myself and others. The meeting to which the gentleman alludes was at another time and at another place.

Mr. STANLY. (interrupting.) The member was not only in the Philadelphia Convention that passed those resolutions, but he was there and made a speech. That he does not deny, although he will deny anything when the proof is not at hand. He cannot deny that; and, by the way, there has been no man who has had a controversy upon this floor with that honorable member who has not raised the issue of veracity with him—no man, whether from the North or South. Not one, that I remember. But, not only was he present, but he made a speech. "The galled jade wince again," (pointing at Mr. GIDDINGS.)

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does the gentleman intend to say that I was present at a meeting in Philadelphia when certain resolutions were agitated, or that I knew they were agitated, or that I spoke in reference to them?

Mr. STANLY. I say he was at a Philadelphia convention, and made a speech at that convention. Did he not?

Mr. GIDDINGS. If the gentleman intends to say—

Mr. STANLY. I say nothing about his intent. But I say what I have said.

Mr. GIDDINGS. That gentleman shall not crack the overseer's lash in that way, to put me down. I say, and I say unhesitatingly, that if he intends to say that I was present, and knew of such resolutions, or heard of them, or heard of any agitation of them, at any meeting, he is mistaken. If he intends, however, to be understood as saying, that late in the day when I was in Philadelphia, I walked into a convention there, and when called upon responded in a few words, he is right. Now, the gentleman may talk about his question of veracity; but when he attempts, in that offensive manner, to misrepresent, he need not undertake to intimidate gentlemen from speaking the truth, and doing so boldly.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the gentleman will not gnash his teeth so hard. He hardly frightens me by this extraordinary exuberance of passion. The honorable gentleman says I shall not crack the overseer's whip over him. That is a favorite figure with the honorable gentleman. The only overseer's lash in my part of the country, that I know of being cracked at all, is not with slaveholders, who manage their negroes without it. We have no crack of the lash with us over our slaves. That is a fancy. The lash is only known to felons and bad negroes. There are bad negroes—and there ought to be bad negroes when we see how meanly white men can act, (laughter)—who should be punished with it. Who is playing overseer over white men? Who but he who makes himself an overseer, cracking the whip, and throwing out his filth and slime over everybody. With him every Northern Whig is a dough-face, and every Democrat is a vile wretch and slaveholder, who performs his duty under the Constitution towards his brethren in the South.

Sir, we do not raise the overseer's lash over our slaves in North Carolina. If that man [pointing to Mr. GIDDINGS] were in the Southern country, Mr. Chairman, there is not a decent man amongst my constituents who would own such a fellow for a slave. He would be a "free nigger," and in less than three weeks would be tied to the whipping-post for stealing or slandering his neighbor. Now the honorable member says, if I say that he was at that convention, when certain resolutions were passed, then I misrepresent him—then I tell a falsehood. Yes, sir, and if I say he is a gentleman, I tell a falsehood; and if I say that these pillars are all made of chalk, I tell a falsehood; and if I say this white piece of paper is as black as the heart of the gentleman from Ohio, I tell a falsehood; but I have said no such thing. But, upon the point of being absent from public business, I charge him with being at Philadelphia in a convention where certain resolutions were passed; and that he made a speech at that convention. That I charged, and that only, and that he does not deny. But he gets over that by saying, that if I say what I did not say, then I misrepresent. Now I not only charge that, for the gentleman was not only at that convention, but he was at some public meeting in Montgomery county, in Pennsylvania, making speeches—at Norristown. He can go away and attend two sessions, and—

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend his remarks a moment?

Mr. STANLY. Certainly. I ought to suspend that fellow by the neck, [pointing to Mr. GIDDINGS.]

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of MILARD P. FILLMORE, his Private Secretary.]

Mr. STANLY. (resuming.) The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] not only indorsed, but threw the overseer's lash over the whole South. But let any gentleman from the North, no matter how high his character, deviate at all in voting from what the gentleman thinks is right, and that moment he is assailed as a dough-face. Let any Southern Democrat vote for any one of these compromise acts, he is a dough-face. Let any Northern patriot vote for any one of them, and at once he becomes a dough-face, and is assailed by the member from Ohio. Sir, he is in the habit of lecturing this House, and he has done so two or three times this session, while I charge him with neglecting his business and running away; and when he is here, with throwing constant impediments in the way of the transaction of the public business.

I regret that I have been led to say a word about this matter. I did not intend to do so. I have departed from the course of conduct I had prescribed to myself towards that member. But his own insolence has caused me this morning to forget it. When there was no matter of that sort before the House, he has got up and poured out his abuse upon the whole House and upon the whole Southern country. In a moment of excitement, I was induced to get up and remind him of his misdeeds, when he arose and insolently stated that what I said was false. He has thrown the first stone; he has begun this business; and, disregarding all propriety, has provoked what he has got, and let him take the consequences and bear the blame—though he is to blame enough to sink a navy, and odium enough to disgrace a regiment of free negroes afflicted with the small-pox, if he had the whole poured upon him.

I beg pardon of this House for having descended—as the gentleman said I did—for having stooped to a controversy with him. I plead guilty to it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to say one word.

Mr. STANLY. Does he want to make an explanation?

Mr. GIDDINGS. When I spoke of the gentleman, saying that what he stated was false, the House will bear testimony that I did not transgress the parliamentary rules. I know my parliamentary rights. I stepped to the verge of parliamentary rules, but there I stopped. Every member understands them. Neither is it insulting or ungentlemanly to correct a man if he is wrong. I did not say that the gentleman intentionally spoke falsehood or misrepresented the facts. No, sir; I knew too well what belongs to gentlemen; what belongs to myself, and to the dignity of this body, to say that. I therefore kept myself within parliamentary rules. When that gentleman is put forward by a certain servile class of the North, as their instrument to assail me; when he undertakes to play the braggart for dough-faces, and serviles for the Swiss guard of slavery; when he undertakes to draw me into a controversy with him, I will say to the gentleman, that when you go so low, as you have to-day, I cannot follow you. It may, sir, be suitable for the grog-shop or the bar-room, but it is not fit for the people whom I represent. Such language would not be permitted among common bar-room loafers of my district. Now when any man expects me to interchange such language with the gentleman, I can only say, he is mistaken. I know whom I represent, and I know that my constituents would never justify me in following any man, or member, to the lowest depths of—

Mr. STANLY, (in his seat.) Mr. Giddings's district.

Mr. GIDDINGS. To the lowest depths of ribaldry. Sir, it is unbecoming any member of this House, and I appeal to the members of this body if they ever knew me to assail a man at any time, or in any place, until I myself was first assailed. And let me say, looking that gentleman and every member of this House in the face, that I have never been guilty of such an outrage upon the dignity of this body, as he has perpetrated on the present occasion. The gentleman had better use such language only to those who crouch and shrink and tremble at his frown. It may do well on the plantation, but it is unbecoming towards freemen. It is unsuited to this Hall. Degradation itself would blush, and the man who would do it must have sunk so low, that he would become giddy were he elevated to the level of total depravity.

There are slaveholders in this House—and I take pleasure in saying it—with whom my relations now are, and ever have been, those of gentlemanly deportment and mutual interchange of respect, and nothing else; and while slaveholders shall demean themselves as gentlemen, no one of them will ever be assailed by me.

But the gentleman says I charge Northern men with being dough-faces. Well, sir, he takes it upon himself to be the representative of all the dough-faces of the North to-day. He speaks for them—he comes here as their agent and attorney, and assails me. And how does he do it? Why he says I am out of order. Mr. Speaker, (the presiding officer of this House [Mr. Boyd] being in the chair,) you yourself made the question as to the order of debate upon this resolution. I believe (alluding to Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, who was then in the chair,) you called me to order, and that gentleman, [Mr. Boyd,] a slaveholder, a man whom I respect and honor, declared that I was in order; and an appeal taken from that decision was laid upon this table; and now this gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] insists that it shall go out to the country that I was out of order, when the Speaker of the House expressly decided that I was in order. Now, I heard that gentleman [Mr. STANLY] once tell an anecdote upon this floor, about a boy, who whirled himself about so rapidly that the hind part of his breeches got on the fore side, (laughter;) but the gentleman changes his position much more rapidly, for the purpose of assailing me, and making a personal altercation between him and myself; pronouncing the Speaker out of order, pronouncing the House out of order, and the rules themselves out of order; and that in discussing these resolutions I was out of order.

The gentleman says I speak of Northern men as dough-faces. Why, the term dough-faces has become honorable among some of those associated with him. He calls me an Abolitionist; I call him a slaveholder.

At the North we have two classes—dough-faces and free-soilers. I acknowledge the name they give me—there is not much in a name—and I permit them to use it; and I give to them the only cognomen, known in the English language, that befits their position.

Mr. STANLY. How many minutes have I left of my time?

The SPEAKER. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman says that I was at Norristown. Where was he when I was at Norristown? Where was the House when I was at Norristown? Why, drinking their grog. [Laughter.] I was among the people of the Union, endeavoring to impress upon them great and important principles—which, at least, I believed to be so. And where was that gentleman? Look at your Journals and you will find the gentleman was at home, or somewhere else, or anywhere else but in this Hall. He was not here. There was no business transacted in this House during the holidays for two weeks. I took occasion then to visit friends, for four days, in other portions of the country, and the gentleman stands up here and reads me lectures about it.

Mr. STANLY. I think the gentleman has had more of my time than I have had myself, to reply to him. I cannot yield further.

Mr. GIDDINGS. One word more.

Mr. STANLY. I will wait a little longer.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Never mind.

Mr. STANLY. The honorable member from Ohio stated in the beginning of his last speech, that there was nothing wrong at all in telling a man that what he said was false. Now that is his idea of decency and propriety. He thinks it is not wrong. He is called a liar so often at home, where he is well known, that he thinks it is right, as a matter of course. Here is his idea of decency. He says that I was put forward to make this attack upon him. If I thought I was so considered by anybody in the House, I would resign my seat and go home, because I believe that if the whole Whig party came forward to attack him, they would have picked the meanest man in the House to do it. [Laughter.] He has made such a show of himself this morning that he has not only disgraced free-soilism, but human nature.

I hope the reporters will take notes of what he has said, and what I have said, and that they will allow neither of us to see them. If he gets them into his hands—have mercy upon me! if he serves this debate as he has everybody. My colleague from the Orange district [Mr. VENABLE] and the member from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] got into a controversy with him the other day, and how were they represented? His speeches were entirely different as spoken and as published. He gets up one day and reads a resolution out of the Congressional Globe, and says these gentlemen voted so and so a year ago, and the next day he has a different set of resolutions reported. I charge the reporters to see that his felonious hand touch not one word of what I have said. Let what has been said appear precisely as delivered. Let his remarks appear as spoken and not as made out after he gets home in his room with some of his colored friends. [Laughter.] The honorable member talks of associations here. Who ever saw him, except upon this floor, with a decent man in Washington city? He receives visits from free negroes sometimes. The charity he dispenses no man knows. He never lets his right hand know what his left hand does, nor his head what is done by either. But he will write a nice letter, full of sympathy about chains, and oppression, and overseers. He remains with his free negro friends when they call to see him; and that is the way he spends his extra hours, and the reason that he goes home about dinner time. The honorable gentleman talked the other day, in my absence, that he would like to have a bout with me, but this morning he asserts that I have been set upon him—that I am urged to attack him, and in his crazy fancy, every one who says a word to me, is giving me some hint about his course. No such thing. A gentleman mentioned to me that he was taking up the whole of my time, and that I had better continue. That was all the information given to me. I want no information in relation to the course of the honorable member from Ohio.

Where was I at the time of the sitting of the Philadelphia Convention? I have not set myself up as the standard of general attention here. He is the man who arraigns everybody, and therefore I come upon him. I do not say, that during the sessions I have always been in the House. We were drinking our grog Christmas week! Where was he? In Philadelphia, drinking beer in oyster-cellars with free negroes. [Laughter.] Who was best employed—those who drank good liquor in the city of Washington, or the honorable member in his employment in Philadelphia? I am rather a temperance man myself, and do not often drink. Judge, ye! He was much better employed than we were, no doubt, in the company of those where to tell a man he is a liar, is an everyday courtesy—that it is to be expected. (Help him—do! He stands in need of it. Whisper into his ear some little more poison, good Free-Soiler from New York, [Mr. KING.] He says that I stated this morning that the Speaker was out of order. Have I said any such thing? The honorable member gets the floor, makes a speech, and no one notices him—no one raises a point of order upon him, and the Speaker does not interfere. He says that I charged the Speaker with being out of order. What relevancy had his speech about slave trade in the Southern States with the printing of joint resolutions from New Jersey? I raised no such point—not at all. I quit this subject in disgust. I feel as if I had been in a dissecting-room cutting up a dead dog. [Laughter.] The House will excuse me. I will treat the honorable member from Ohio hereafter as he ought to be treated by the members of this House—as an insane man, who never was taught decency or propriety of conduct. His associations show him never to have mingled among gentlemen. I hope I shall not be again provoked from what is due to myself to descend so low as to notice him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move the previous question upon the motion to print.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman permit me one word of explanation?

[Cries of "No! no! We have had enough."]

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was then taken, and the motion to print was agreed to.

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. HOUSTON offered the usual resolution in blank for closing debate upon the President's message in the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union.

Mr. H. I have left the time blank, that an hour may be fixed by the House at which it may be their pleasure to close the debate in committee. I will propose Thursday (to-morrow) at two o'clock.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. We have not been in Committee of the Whole upon the President's message more than three hours this session.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think we have been in committee two or three days.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think not exceeding three hours.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the resolution is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. That has been the custom of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will not, then, move the previous question, but will leave the House to fix the time at which debate shall be closed in the committee.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move this day week.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to lay the resolution upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up those resolutions on the President's message.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish, before that is done, to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has made a privileged motion, which cannot be superseded while pending by another privileged motion.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the motion of the gentleman has precedence to certain other motions; but if the Chair will permit me, a rule of the House says that the Committee on Printing can report at any time. A privileged question certainly takes precedence.

The SPEAKER. The rules say, also, that a majority may at any time suspend the rules and resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House upon the state of the Union; and each being, in the opinion of the present incumbent of the chair, [Mr. JONES,] of the same character, the first made must be the first put. If the chairman of the Committee on Printing had first made his motion, of course he would have had the precedence.

of the motion to go into committee. The motion to resolve the House into the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union being always a special one, provided for by the rules, in the opinion of the Chair takes precedence of any other privileged motion.

Mr. GORMAN. I will then ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion. The report will not take more than three minutes to be considered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing that my motion shall remain in abeyance until his is acted upon, if it will not occupy much time.

There was no objection.

FEES OF CLERKS, MARSHALS, AND ATTORNEYS.

Mr. GORMAN. The Committee on Printing report the following resolution relative to printing the report of the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report of the Judiciary Committee in regard to the fees of clerks, marshals, and attorneys in the district courts of the United States, be printed for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. G. said: After examining the matter, I will state to the House, that this report speaks of the difficulties and complexities of this subject under our existing law. It traces the history of legislation in regard to this subject, since the organization of the Government. It points out the abuses which have grown up under the present system in the way of taxes and costs, and shows the enormous and unprecedented increase of the expenditures. There is accompanying it a tabular statement, and the letter of the First Comptroller, giving some specific charges and abuses in the courts of the United States in regard to this question, of rather extraordinary importance to the country.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to amend, by adding five thousand copies of the report of the Clerk to this House, upon the contingent expenses of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is not in order, being upon a different subject; and the motion for the printing of an extra number of copies would have to go to the Committee on Printing.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

DR. OWEN'S GEOLOGICAL REPORT.

Mr. GORMAN. I have another report, which will not keep the attention of the House long, and which it is indispensably necessary should be passed immediately. It is a resolution upon the subject of printing the report of the United States Geologist, which has been passed upon a long time in the Senate. We have not acted upon it, and they cannot print it until we do not upon it.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House three thousand five hundred copies of the final report of Dr. D. D. Owen on the geology of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota; and that such be executed in the same form and style and under the same special contract which has been authorized by the Senate to be entered into by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that five hundred copies be set apart for the disposal of said office.

The whole of this matter is under the control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, and it requires a resolution to provide for the amount to be printed.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. HIBBARD, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Stephen Hoyt be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. OLDS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] moves to suspend the rules, for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I wish to inquire of the Chair, when we get into Committee of the Whole whether we will not be compelled to take up the special order?

Mr. HOUSTON. That portion of my motion was merely an indication to the House—

Mr. OLDS. I ask the Chair, if we will not be compelled to take up the special order?

The SPEAKER. That will be a question for the committee to decide.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE, by unanimous consent of the House, presented a joint memorial from the Legislature of Alabama to Congress, asking an appropriation of lands to complete the geological survey of the State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS—FEES OF LAND OFFICERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business before the committee, in the opinion of the Chair, is the special order of the House, being the joint resolution No. 1 of the House, making land warrants assignable. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] would have been entitled to his hour, when this resolution came up the other day, and he has that privilege now, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. GORMAN. I have a motion to suggest. I understand that there has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a joint resolution with regard to the public printing. That resolution being reported to the House, under a rule of privilege, or what may be termed a privileged question, I suppose it cannot be divested of that privilege by being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I apprehend that notwithstanding there may be a special order for the day, that question comes up in despite of the special order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the committee having been in session upon the special order of the House, being not only the Senate bill, but the joint resolution of the House, that that special order is not yet completed, and this question of printing cannot supersede the special order.

Mr. GORMAN. I will suggest to the Chair the reason that this question of land warrants was taken up was, because I never made a question. I have been informed that the decisions of the Chair had been uniform, where these questions had been put, and it had been decided that the question of privilege was not divested of its right by being referred to the committee. I have not made the question before, and consequently it was not necessary to decide it, and as a matter of course the bounty land question came up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] that the question is not debatable. Does the gentleman desire to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Chair decide that—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the special order of the House, not being finished yet, and upon which the committee were still engaged at its last sitting, has a preference over any other business of the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I understood that we had disposed of it.

The CHAIRMAN. There were two matters referred jointly.

Mr. GORMAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I understand the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana, it is this: that because the Committee on Printing have a right to report at any time—

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the appeal debatable?

Mr. JONES. I am not debating it. I merely wish to know, if I understand the question. The point the gentleman from Indiana makes is, if I understand him rightly, that because the Committee on Printing have the right, under the rules, to report at any time, their report should take precedence of all other business, even of special orders in Committee of the Whole. It loses all its privilege when it gets into the House.

The question was then taken upon the appeal, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to lay the bounty land bill aside.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the committee have no power to lay aside the special orders of the House. The committee is tied down by the order of the House.

Mr. FITCH. This bill may be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would be in order, if the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] who is entitled to the floor, waives his right to his hour.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, and I will waive my right.

Mr. FITCH. I move, then, that the resolution be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Is not the resolution, however, open for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly it is.

Mr. MARSHALL. The committee will recollect that many of us were—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed, but amendments will be in order under the five minutes rule.

Mr. MARSHALL. What is the motion now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is that the resolution be laid aside and reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have an amendment to offer before that motion is taken, and I design offering it now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I barely wish to state, that there are a number of gentlemen upon this floor who wish to extend the provisions of the existing bounty act to individuals not embraced in the present bill. As I urged upon the committee the other day, that we should pass the bill we had then before the House and take up this bill, I now wish to notify the House, that all of us who are in favor of extending the bounty land act, should not agree to the motion made by the gentleman upon my left [Mr. FITCH,] but we should take up this bill and go through with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution will be read through by sections. The first section of the joint resolution of the House will be now read, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] can make his amendment.

Section 1st was then read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That nothing in the act approved September twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and fifty, "granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," shall be so construed as to prevent the sale and transfer of any certificate or warrant issued by virtue of said act, prior to the location of the same, or the issue of the patent thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. We have already acted upon that subject, and I therefore move to strike out the first section.

The motion was agreed to. So the first section was stricken out.

The Clerk then read the 2d section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall hereafter be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services, in locating bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, said compensation to be hereafter paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants, in all cases where the same have been transferred by the soldier or his legal or personal representative, under the provisions of the act of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office on that subject, and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown, to the satisfaction of the General Land Office, that the same was located by the soldier or warrantee, or in case of his death by his next of kin, as provided by the acts of Congress aforesaid.

Mr. GAYLORD moved to strike out the 2d section.

Mr. CABELL. I desire to amend that section before the question is taken on striking out. I move to strike out all after the word "warrants" in the 9th line, as follows:

"In all cases where the same have been transferred by the soldier or his legal or personal representative, under the provisions of the acts of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office on that subject, and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the General Land Office that the same was located by the soldier or warrantee, or in case of his death by his next of kin, as provided by the acts of Congress aforesaid."

Mr. C. continued. When this question was last before the House, this whole subject of the payment of registers and receivers was very fully discussed. The conclusion at which I then arrived as to the temper and feeling of the House, was, that there was no possibility of inducing the members of this House to pay anything out of the Treasury of the United States to these registers and receivers. But it seems to me, that the sense of justice of every member on this floor must bring him to the conclusion, that the men who render this service for the holders of these warrants, should be remunerated in some way. I propose, therefore, to strike out all that part of the section which relates to the past, and requires payment by the Government for the future, so as to leave the payment to be made by the holders of the warrants to the registers and receivers. This I would suggest as a compromise between the two parties in this House—those who are opposed to any compensation, and those who are only opposed to compensation for past services.

I am satisfied that much injustice may be done to the registers and receivers in past time, but I am in favor of doing justice as far as I can. I have come to the conclusion, that it is utterly impossible to induce the House to pay out of the Treasury of the United States for these past services, and therefore I am for making provision for payment in future.

I think that the holders of these warrants, as well as the assignees, ought to be made to pay this, and will be willing to do it.

I represent a large number of holders of bounty land warrants, and the argument that it is wrong that the soldier should be called on to pay one dollar for one hundred and sixty acres of land, does not carry with it any force with me. I am satisfied that my constituents—the present holders of these warrants as well as the assignees—are perfectly willing to pay the men who do this service.

Now, I appeal to gentlemen who think something ought to be done for the registers and receivers, that they will meet on this common ground, and say, that in future the holders of the warrants shall pay the amount here specified to the registers and receivers. A very large portion of these warrants have yet to be issued, and so far as any mere party question is concerned, I will say to the Democratic gentlemen who are so confident that at the next election they will succeed in removing the Whig incumbents from office, that they will get the benefit of this provision, because we know, from the number of warrants to be issued, it will be utterly impossible that half of them can be located within the next twelve months. There will be equal and just compensation to all the parties concerned, and I trust the House will adopt the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion to strike out the second section,

Mr. SACKETT moved further to amend the section proposed to be stricken out, by striking out all after the word "warrants," in the fourth line, and to including the word "acre," in the seventh line, as follows:

"The same rate of compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of $1 25 per acre."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"As follows: for warrants of forty acres, fifty cents; for warrants of eighty acres, one dollar; and for warrants of one hundred and sixty acres, two dollars."

Mr. S. said: The effect of that amendment will be to fix a specific compensation for these registers and receivers, and to make it just half the present rate, or half per cent. each.

This subject was pretty fully discussed when the bill from the Senate, of a similar character to this, was before the House the other day. I am satisfied the House does not intend to pass a provision giving to the registers and receivers the same compensation for locating these warrants that is allowed them for the location of purchased lands, for the reason that these warrants are generally brought to the offices in parcels, and the labor of locating them is therefore not so great as is the labor of locating purchased lands. If I understand the general law—and I believe I do—the compensation proposed by this amendment will be one half the present compensation.

Mr. DUNHAM here interposed a remark, but in such a low voice as to be entirely inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. SACKETT. It will be just half the compensation.

I have no disposition to discuss this question further. It was amply debated when the bill from the Senate was before the House. If it is the desire of the House to reduce the compensation of these officers one half, this amendment will accomplish that object, and preserve a uniform rate of compensation.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am opposed to this amendment, and to every amendment having for its object the allowance of compensation to these receivers and registers for duties connected with these bounty land warrants. But I would ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT,] upon what principle he would make this compensation a percentage? It requires the same labor to register a forty acre warrant as it does to register an eighty or one hundred and sixty acre warrant. If any compensation at all should be given them for these services, it seems to me that it ought to be upon the principle reported by the select committee, and that is to allow them a fixed compensation for locating a bounty land warrant, whether for forty or one hundred and sixty acres. If, therefore, gentlemen intend to pay them anything at all, the proper way would be to allow them fifty cents for each warrant. There is just as much trouble in locating a small warrant as a large one, and there is no reason for a percentage in this case. Where the lands are purchased, the percentage is allowed for the trouble and expense of receiving the money and taking care of it, and transmitting it to the Government. But I am opposed to giving them anything. These officers now have a salary of $500. What other duties have they to perform but to be there from day to day, and from morning till night, if you please, in the discharge of the duties incumbent on them as registers and receivers? It is for that they receive their salaries of $500? Why give them additional compensation? The original percentage was allowed, because they had to take care of the public money, and not for the performance of these duties. I am, therefore, in favor of striking out the whole section.

Mr. GAYLORD. I wish to modify my amendment so as to strike out the 2d section and insert the 2d section of the bill reorted by the select committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time, as there is an amendment pending.

Mr. DUNHAM. What is the precise position of the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GAYLORD] moves to strike out the 2d section. The gentleman from New York moves to amend that section by striking out what was read, and inserting a provision to reduce the compensation one half.

Mr. DUNHAM. Is it in order now to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, by adding "and insert the 2d section of the bill reported by the select committee?"

The CHAIRMAN. That motion will be in order. It is, however, in order, in the first place, to move to amend the section proposed to be stricken out. Such a motion is pending, and it is now in order to move to amend that portion proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Is it not in order for the gentleman from Ohio to modify his own motion? The gentleman from Ohio, if I understand it rightly, moved to strike out the 2d section; he now proposes to modify his motion so as to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in order. Mr. HARRIS. Well, that is precisely what I understand the gentleman from Ohio proposes to do.

Mr. GAYLORD then modified his motion to strike out the 2d section of the joint resolution of the House, and to insert the 2d section of the bill reported by the select committee, as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall each be entitled to receive fifty cents for his services in locating each bounty land warrant by him located, to be paid by the person or persons locating the same; but this act shall not be so construed as to allow any register or receiver to receive any greater maximum of salary and fees than by law he is now entitled."

The CHAIRMAN. That question will not be taken, however, until the amendment of the gentleman from New York is disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. To be sure not, but when that amendment is disposed of, the pending question will be on the motion to strike out and insert, if the gentleman is allowed to make the modification.

Mr. STUART. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York, so as to give these officers two per cent. each, instead of one per cent. for both.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire, if it is in order, to move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, which is to strike out the 2d section, by inserting the 2d section of the bill reported by the select committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio; he has modified his amendment.

Mr. STUART. I have some solicitude upon this subject, but I confess I have also my misgivings as to my own ability, or as to the ability of anybody, to arrest the attention of this committee so as to induce them to act deliberately upon this question. But still I ask the indulgence of the committee, while I submit a few remarks.

I wish to call attention to the fact, that on the last day when this question was discussed here, every single member that rose and opposed amendments to the former bill, declared his willingness to pay these registers and receivers.

[Cries of "Oh! no!"]

Mr. STUART. Yes. I have the record, and I say that on that day every man who opposed amendments to the bill then pending, indicated a willingness to pay these officers, but insisted that it was out of place; that we should first pass the first section of the bill making the land warrants assignable, and then make provision for the compensation of registers and receivers afterwards.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I was one of those who opposed that bill, and yet I certainly did not express myself as in favor of this compensation to registers and receivers.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman did not understand me. I did not say that every gentleman who had spoken in opposition to the bill had expressed himself in favor of paying these registers and receivers, but every gentleman who expressed any opinion upon the subject; and, so far as my recollection goes, such was the fact. There were several gentlemen who spoke on the bill who did not express any opinion, one way or the other, in relation to the matter.

I now wish to direct the attention of the House to the propriety of paying these men. I desire to say, in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that argument would be just as good against paying a receiver or register for any other business. They had $500 salary for entering these lands, payable in money, and they have it now. But Congress has interposed and made land warrants receivable, thereby taking away a great deal of their pay, and reducing it to a mere pittance in most instances, because, in a large majority of cases, the receipts of the land office would not amount to $500, exclusive of clerk hire. Now, is it fair for Congress to interpose and make an article receivable out of which they received their pay, and then refuse to compensate them for their loss? Is there any principle in it? Is there any reason in it? I think not. If this principle be a true one, you may go further, and make nothing but land warrants receivable, thereby reducing their compensation, in all cases, to the $500 a salary merely, which would leave them bankrupt.

It was said here, the other day, that a man might hold a land office and attend to it at his convenience, or that in addition to it he might be a merchant, or practice law, or attend to his farm, or anything else. But who can tell when a man will come to enter land? I say the land officer must be at his office all the time; and if you desire to have responsible and competent officers, you must pay them. The essence of the matter is this: you have interposed by law to make an article receivable for land which was not receivable before, thereby taking from your land officers their just compensation by altering the basis of their percentages, and you now refuse to pay them.

Now, it is said, let the holders of the warrants pay for them. That is all right when the warrant has been assigned; but while it is still in the hands of the soldier, he should not be compelled to pay for it, because, if you insist upon that, his bounty is a mere pittance, not worth receiving. Now, in my humble opinion—and I speak it with deference—we ought to step in and do what is but a mere act of justice to these officers.

Mr. DUNHAM. I stated, the other day, that I should not say another word in reference to this subject, but I wish the House to have correct information as to the amount of clerk hire required in these offices. I hold in my hand a list of all the land offices in the country. Now, in order that the committee may have a correct idea of the amount of the clerk hire required, it is necessary to show an account of the warrants which are entered. I will call their attention to this fact. I have but cast my eye over the list, but I will venture to say that not one third—and not one quarter of the land offices in the United States have, for the whole time since Mexican warrants were first issued, located five hundred warrants a year. Now, if this is true, where is the necessity of this extra compensation for clerk hire? Now, as was stated the other day, by a letter received from a gentleman in Iowa, it was shown that three clerks could enter one thousand warrants in two weeks, and they could enter five hundred warrants in one week. Yet, with these facts staring them in the face, gentlemen get up and tell this committee that this compensation is absolutely necessary in order to pay for clerk hire.

I desire to make one further remark, and it is this: In two thirds of the land offices in the United States they do not begin to enter land enough, if we adopt the present rate of percentage, to pay the $500 salary which is paid to the officers. And I again say, what I said the other day, I believe, and if I did not, I will say it now, that in several of these offices, for a whole quarter, not a single warrant has been located.

I have one other remark. I say to those gentlemen who have control of these public lands, that I think they are neglecting their duty, if they do not, during this Congress, bring forward a bill to consolidate and abolish many of the land offices now existing, where we are not receiving money enough to pay the actual salary which we are compelled to pay the registers and receivers.

Mr. ORR. I desire to ask the gentleman if he has received information from any source, that a single officer has resigned his office in consequence of the increase of labor from land warrants being made receivable? And if he has ever heard of any difficulty in finding other officers as competent if such resignations have taken place?

Mr. DUNHAM. I answered the gentleman's interrogatory the other day, in reply, I believe, to a question asked by my colleague, [Mr. FITCH.] I said that, when the Administration changed, I do not know of a single man who was willing to go out of office. And when removals were made, I do not know of a single office in my county where there was not at least a "corporal's guard" of applicants for the place; and that, too, at a time when the bounty land law was in full operation. I know of many cases where the officers could not make $500 a year out of the office.

Mr. CLARK. I wish further to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.] I wish to say that they did not resign because they expected pay.

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order.

The question was then taken upon Mr. STEVART's amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. SACKETT's amendment.

Mr. FITCH. I think the amendment of the gentleman from New York is to reduce the compensation one half. Am I right?

Mr. SACKETT. That is my amendment.

Mr. FITCH. I am willing to make a compromise in this matter. Not that I believe that will be doing justice to these officers, but for the sake of making a compromise, I move to amend the amendment by providing for the payment of one dollar for each and every warrant located.

As I remarked, this is not doing justice to these officers, for Congress by making these warrants receivable, have nearly quadrupled the labor of these officers over that of entering these lands for cash. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen around me to some of their own remarks, and particularly that of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] As I understood that gentleman, he speaks of the $500 being given these officers as salary, and of the percentage, as being only designed to pay for traveling expenses, and for a guardianship over the money.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not say that was the only reason for the percentage, but as one reason.

Mr. FITCH. Very well; as one of the reasons. But the register has no control or guardianship over the money after it is primarily paid. And it will be found that that officer receives no other compensation in the shape of insurance upon this money for transporting it to the Land Office, or to the place where he is directed by law to deposit it. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STEVART,] who preceded me, very properly called the attention of the committee to the profession, which was so liberally made a few days since, of willingness to pay these officers a just compensation. I spoke then of these professions as mere subterfuges; and the debate which has occurred to-day, together with the voting upon the various propositions which have been before the committee, will show that I was correct in my statement. If there was a disposition manifested upon that occasion to compensate these officers justly and properly for their labor, that disposition will be manifested now by a refusal to do so.

I have heard this service compared to that of a laborer. I did not hear this in debate, but I have heard it in conversation; and if I mistake not, my colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM,] the chairman of the select committee who reported this bill, has made use of that comparison. Now, for the sake of the thing, let us take it upon this ground. Let us suppose that a laborer under certain considerations is to receive a certain salary or percentage for a service to be performed, and let us suppose that afterwards the character of that service should be changed so as to not only increase the labor, but to diminish the compensation which he had a right to expect. Is it not fair to compensate that man for his services? Is it not unfair to refuse to make that payment for his services? It has been asked, and the question has been repeated here as if it were pertinent to the subject—"Have any of these officers resigned?" The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] asked if any of these officers have resigned for want of sufficient compensation? I will remark, that if these resignations have not taken place, it has been because the original bounty land law made provision for something in the shape of compensation for locating these lands—fifty cents each, if I mistake not. After this law was changed, these officers would hold on month after month with the hope that the location of warrants at these particular offices would not increase, and that the cash sales would not materially lessen, until at last they find themselves creditors to the Government to large amounts in their estimation, and they determine to hold on to their offices until the Government had discharged the debt.

My colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] said that in some offices there are no lands entered by these warrants. This, surely, is no reason for not compensating officers where lands have been entered, because this bill does not operate upon such offices. The Government will pay those officers nothing, whether the cash sales have been more or less; whether the percentage amounts to $500, or less than sufficient to pay their annual salary, it matters not.

Mr. DUNHAM. My colleague did not understand me, or I did not make myself clear in my remark. The force I gave to the remark was, that but few warrants were located at those offices, and consequently small cash sales, and that $500 salary would pay for the extra labor of locating these warrants.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BISSELL. Is it in order to move an amendment at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Any gentleman has the right to oppose the amendment.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I wish to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and simply upon this ground: If I understand correctly his mode of reasoning, it is, that because the Government has imposed additional services upon these receivers, it is bound to make them additional compensation. Now, if he is correct, why would not the rule apply with equal force to collectors of our revenue—say, for instance, at the port of New-York, where there has been an additional amount of revenue collected? Why would it not apply to the officers of the Army and Navy, if by any unforeseen contingency additional services should be imposed upon them?

Mr. FITCH. I would ask if the officers of the Army and Navy receive a percentage as a part of their salary? Their compensation is fixed, and no percentage is allowed them.

Mr. FULLER. So I understand; and so I understand the salary of the receivers is a fixed one; and upon the most ordinary principles of justice between man and man, where a man employs a laborer for a specified price, and imposes additional services upon him, beyond those stipulated in the contract to be performed, he is at liberty to say it is a departure from the contract, and I will no longer labor for this compensation.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. FITCH; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BISSELL. I send up an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the part proposed to be stricken out?

Mr. BISSELL. I am not quite certain that I understand the condition of the matter as it now stands. I offer it as an addition to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes it is not in order, as the amendment now under consideration is to strike out a portion of the section and to insert. It will be in order after the question is taken on the pending amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. SACKETT; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. BISSELL. I now propose the amendment which I send to the table, as an addition to the 2d section.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And be it enacted, That registers and receivers, whether in or out of office at the passage of this act, or their legal representatives in case of death, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States, for services heretofore performed in locating military bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation provided in the preceding section for services hereafter to be performed, after deducting the amount already received by such officers under the act entitled "An act to require the holders of military land warrants to compensate the land officers of the United States for services in relation to the location of those warrants," approved May seventeenth, eighteen hundred and forty-eight: Provided, That no register or receiver shall receive any compensation out of the Treasury for past services, who has charged and received illegal fees for the location of such warrants: And provided further, That no register or receiver shall receive for his services during any year a greater compensation than the maximum now allowed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose it as an additional section to the bill?

Mr. BISSELL. I propose it as an addition to the 2d section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then suggests that the phraseology be altered, as it refers to a preceding section, and there is no preceding section, the first section having been struck out.

Mr. BISSELL. The amendment can be so altered. I understand, by a vote of this committee this morning, upon an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] that it is the deliberate sense of this House, that registers and receivers ought to be paid for their services in locating military bounty land warrants, and I concur in that sentiment most fully. The committee has decided now, as I understand, that hereafter registers and receivers shall be paid for such services. Am I right? I did not pay particular attention to the early proceedings in this committee, but I suppose such was the result of the vote taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL.] However that may be, I trust that the committee will so decide, and that it will also decide that it is equally just that they should be compensated for the services which they have already performed. I have listened to all that has been urged in this committee to-day, and heretofore, in opposition to the proposition to allow registers and receivers compensation for locating these warrants, and I have listened in vain for anything that answers for an argument. It has been said that five hundred dollars is a sufficient compensation to these men for all their services. If that be so—and I understand that to be the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS]—I should like to know why that gentleman, before this time, has not introduced a bill into this House to reduce the salaries of registers and receivers: for does he not know that by the law, as the law now stands, registers and receivers may, and some of them do, receive as high as three thousand dollars? That being the fact, and the opinion of the gentleman being that five hundred dollars is ample compensation, why has he never moved to reduce and equalize these salaries?

Again: it has been said that land officers speculate in land warrants, and by that means make money outside of the fees they receive as officers. That is a charge easily made, but against how many of the officers is it true? Gentlemen get up, and proclaim to this House that these land officers speculate in land warrants illegally, and make fortunes thereby. I cannot answer such an argument. I know land officers who have done no such thing, and I do not know of one who has. I do not pretend to deny that land officers have done such things.

Again, it is said that all the warrants located at any particular office in one year, might be located in three weeks by the aid of three clerks, and it is inferred from that, by the gentlemen pressing this argument, that the registers and receivers ought to be paid for only three weeks' services. Why, sir, that may be true—though they would have to be extraordinary clerks to perform that amount of labor in so short a time—yet it is not known that these land warrants come to the land offices, day by day, scattered along, upon one day one, upon another two, and upon another five, and that registers and receivers know not when they are coming? They have to be at their offices all the time, lest when a man comes twenty, thirty, or fifty miles with his land warrant, he cannot get into the office. The offices have to be kept open, and the officers or their clerks must be there at all times, and should be paid for their services accordingly.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask that the vote may be taken upon this subject, for it is useless to discuss all these amendments.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. BISSELL, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. BELL. Is it in order to move to insert an additional section to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that it will not be in order at this time, the 2d section being under consideration. The gentleman will have an opportunity to offer his amendment, however, before the bill is disposed of.

Mr. FICKLIN. I propose to amend the 2d section. What was the amendment last voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT.]

Mr. FICKLIN. Was that voted down?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. FICKLIN. Then I propose to amend by allowing three quarters of one per cent. wherever land is sold for cash. I can see no sound reason why speculators and individuals purchasing land warrants of soldiers, should be permitted to locate them free of charge, when a person who pays the money at $1 25 per acre is compelled to pay one per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. The individual does not pay it, but the Government.

Mr. FICKLIN. I can see no difference. Now, what is the state of the case, and what is likely to be the state of the case under the operation of the bill which has passed this House, and which, from present indications, will certainly pass the Senate in some form or other, making land warrants assignable? Is it not apparent that almost the entire business of the land offices in the land States, will be confined to the location of land warrants? Is it not certain, as absolutely certain as mathematical calculation can make it, that where individuals can purchase land warrants covering one hundred and sixty acres of land for $100, that all the business of these offices will be confined to the location of land warrants, not in the hands of the original soldiers who rendered the services for which they were received, but in the hands of speculators who have purchased these warrants?

Now, it has been said by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. SPRAGGS,] who, not living in any of the new States where this work has to be performed, cannot be so familiarly acquainted with it as the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] who occupies the same position—that $500 is a compensation to these land officers. I say that $500 is not a compensation to any land officer competent to the discharge of the duties of one of these offices. It requires something more than a day laborer. It requires a man of education, a man of skill, a man of judgment, to discharge creditably to himself and usefully to the Government and the people the duties of one of these offices. And I think no gentleman upon this floor, in view of the salaries which are paid to the various and almost innumerable officers of the Government, will say that even a clerk, competent to discharge the duties imposed upon land officers, would be compensated by the salary which is given—the sum of $500. It has been well said, and I believe the remark cannot be successfully contradicted, that in most of the offices the percentage and salary added together will not amount to the sum of $700. I ask if that sum will support a family of a man competent to discharge the duties of these offices?

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to direct his attention to this point: What would be the advantage of the position in point of capital for land speculation in these offices? Would it fall below a capital of $50,000?

Mr. FICKLIN. I will reply to the gentleman's interrogatory—that it is not worth, to the faithful and honest land officer, one cent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. YATES. I dislike to trouble the House, but I will make one more appeal to the members of the House upon the subject of giving to these land officers fair compensation for past and future services. If the gentlemen upon this side of the House will not listen to the just appeals of their fellow-Whigs, who have been in office, I will address the appeal to the gentlemen upon the other side, and I will say to those gentlemen, that while their Democratic registers and receivers were in office they received this commission of one per cent. upon the actual cash sales. They received it all the time they were in office. This law giving a salary of five hundred dollars, and a commission of one per cent. on the moneys received, as a compensation for clerk hire, receiving, safe-keeping, and transmitting the public moneys, was originally passed in the year 1818. The Democratic registers and receivers have received this compensation for a period of thirty years past. I then ask the Democratic members of this House, if they will not do equal justice to the Whig office holders—the registers and receivers who held office under the last and present Administrations? I ask them to do the same justice to the Whig office holders that this Government has done in all time past to Democratic office-holders.

It is not true, as is contended, that these registers and receivers invariably receive this compensation of $500, although that is the stated salary. I have shown that in the district of land subject to sale at Springfield, Illinois, the percentage land officers are allowed, and the amount they receive for the location of land warrants, both, do not amount to the sum of $500. Well, then, add $500, their fixed salary, and deduct for clerk-hire, (and you cannot get a good clerk for less than $400,)—

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question—

Mr. YATES. I would ask the gentleman to excuse me, as I have but a few minutes more. You cannot get a good merchant's clerk in the West for less than $400. Out of that $1,000 is to be deducted clerk-hire, office-rent, fuel, stationery, the expense of receiving, safe-keeping, and transmitting the public money. And in numerous land districts in the West, the percentage on cash sales, and the amount received for locating assigned warrants, are not as much as that received in the Springfield district. Do gentlemen say that this is adequate compensation?

I repeat again, sir, that if our Whig friends will not do justice to Whig receivers and registers, I appeal to the sense of justice of the members upon the other side. I ask them to mete out the same measure of justice to Whig office-holders that they have to the Democratic, and especially when they assert with so much confidence that we are to have these offices for so very short a period longer. I submit it to the sense of justice of this House. What more can we do or say? Will gentlemen close their ears against a true statement of the facts? The appeal of these registers and receivers is a just one; their compensation has been and is entirely inadequate. And, sir, I cannot conceive how gentlemen can refuse to allow them that to which they are so manifestly entitled by every consideration of fairness and propriety. And the more especially, should this be the case, when we do not propose to increase their compensation, but to give them only the same pay which registers and receivers have always had from the Government.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move to insert "one quarter." My object is to give my young friend from Illinois some information that I think he does not possess in reference to this matter, although he resides in the Springfield district. The amount of salary and perquisites of the register at the Springfield land office—who, I believe, was a Whig incumbent—was $1,411 94, including the deductions of which the gentleman has spoken. For the three quarters of last year the whole amount of compensation of the receiver was $1,295 and some cents. The whole number of Mexican land warrants located at the Springfield land office, from the beginning to the present time, was 1,463. They have been about four years being located, which will make something less than four hundred a year; and they received half a dollar each for nearly all of them—making $200 more to be added to the annual compensation I have already stated. I do not know how many additional clerks that register or receiver needed to have employed to locate these warrants. I should think this additional $200 ought to have paid all the additional clerk-hire.

Mr. YATES. What was the amount of cash sales during the same period? How much did they receive upon cash sales?

Mr. DUNHAM. I will give the gentleman the percentage received, and then he can figure it himself. He has more time than I have, as I am speaking and he is not.

Mr. YATES. For the period of four years and eight months, the cash sales were $102,000. Well, by making a calculation the percentage will be over $250.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman is mistaken. I have the record from the land office.

Mr. YATES. I have the same.

Mr. DUNHAM. I have the record lying before me, that contains the income of every land office in the United States; as also the number of warrants which have been located at every office. The gentleman is in very great error.

Mr. YATES. I have the statement of the Commissioner of the Land Office and cannot be mistaken.

Mr. DUNHAM. I want to say a word in reference to the gentleman's allusion to the Democratic party. I believe the first bounty land law was enacted under a Democratic Administration, and at the time one branch of Congress was Democratic; the officers in the land offices were Democrats. I apprehend, then, that the Democratic party have had something to do in fixing the compensation which was to be paid for the location of these land warrants, and consequently I think the Democratic party did mete out to those then in offices, precisely what we are willing to extend to those now holding these offices.

Mr. PARKER. I was not disposed to trespass upon the time of the House, but it struck me there was an idea or two connected with this matter that has not yet been properly considered. I will observe, however, in the first place, that it appears to me this discussion has degenerated, and that it does not become the character of this House, particularly at this juncture, to inquire whether Whigs or Democrats are to be profited by this bill. Our land laws are not of recent origin. They date back some thirty, perhaps forty years, or more. They have worked remarkably well during all that time. If there is any one system of laws connected with this whole country that has been popular with the mass of the people, it is our land laws. What has made them so? Because they were nearly as perfect as any of our laws could be. Now, how stands it, so far as this matter of compensation to registers and receivers is concerned? For perhaps thirty years they have been under the system of compensation we ask now that they shall be allowed to not under in reference to bounty land warrants. What new principle has intervened to change the system in this regard? I would like gentlemen to answer me this question. Has the time come to diminish the rate of their compensation, especially when there is nothing left but the remnant of large districts of fine land. Take my own State, if you please. There is no public lands in my own district. There is not an acre left there. We have no land officer. I have no interest in this question, directly or indirectly, but I am interested in the institutions of this country. This system has worked well. Nearly all the lands have been taken up in my State. The districts are comparatively impoverished.

These land officers now occupying these offices are parsimoniously paid under the new system you impose upon them. Is it right? Does it become the American people at this juncture, and for what? Why is the compensation of these land officers thus cut down? Why, it is to make a bounty for these men who have periled their lives in the bloody wars for the defence of the country—it is for this that these civilians—these land officers are thus bled—it is to pay the soldier out of the money that is extracted from these land officers. Does that become the chivalry of the American people? Are we thus straightened to raise the bounty our gratitude would pay? I think not. Return to the system we have long acted upon, and a blush of shame will not then mantle your cheek, especially in a case of this kind. If we have been paying these officers too much in times gone by, when the West was full of fat lands, and everybody was seeking them from the ends of the earth—let us declare in the abstract that we have been doing so, and that we have been deceived all the while, rather than go to work now upon these land officers who are holding, upon stinted allowances, the same positions their predecessors have for many long years, upon liberal pay, and that too for the purpose of raising a bounty for the soldiers who have reflected credit and glory upon the character of your country. Now is that right? Is it proper? Is this House, are the American people prepared for such a step?

Connected with this matter, there is another thing, I confess, does not very well accord with my sentiments of right and of justice. It is the attack upon the office-holders. Sir, the time will not come soon when we can do without office-holders, and when we are not bound to them. It is best to be upon good terms with them. If we could place ourselves at defiance with these office-holders, and all others in Government positions, there might be some propriety in it; but so long as we have a Government we must have officers; and they should not be assailed as our enemies. We have had some experience, as I said before, in times gone by; and who has complained that these officers were too well paid, when their income was much more than now? In the most rampant time of Jacksonism, or the Whiggery of other days, did you hear a word of complaint that those officers were getting too much? Why is it the cry is raised now against their compensation? Let them answer who can. And let them say if the country has become so poor that this tax must be levied upon land officers to raise proper bounty for the soldier.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DUNHAM's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question then recurring upon Mr. YATES's amendment, it was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurring upon Mr. GAYLORD's amendment to strike out the 2d section of the resolution and to insert the 2d section of the bill of the select committee.

Mr. STUART demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BELL offered the following as an additional section, to come in it at the end of the 2d section:

1. That the provisions of the act entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," passed September 28, 1850, be and are hereby intended to and for the service of any commissioned officer, musician, or private, who engaged to serve for a definite or indefinite period of time, and actually did serve some time, though less than thirty days in any of said wars enumerated in the first section of said act, so as to allow to such person or persons entitled thereto forty acres.

2. That in cases where there is no widow or minor child or children, entitled under the provisions of said act, then the heirs at law and next of kin shall be entitled to receive the same quantity of land that such deceased commissioned officer, musician, or private, would have received had he been living at the passage of said act.

3. That in the event of the death of a commissioned officer, musician, or private, who shall have made application for bounty land under the provisions of said act, during the pendency of such application, any warrant issued in the name of any such deceased applicant, such warrant so issued shall not become void, but shall inure to and for the benefit of those entitled thereto, the same as if such officer or soldier had been deceased at the passage of said act.

Mr. BELL. I wish, in a very few words, to direct the attention of the committee to the provisions of the amendment I propose, for I am satisfied that if they understand it, they will give it their support. The first amendment I propose is, that where applications are made under the law of 1850, for those who were in the war of 1812, and the Indian war, and who served less than thirty days, or actually engaged to serve and were honorably discharged according to the provisions of that act, they should be entitled to forty acres of bounty land. Now, such is the provision granting bounty land to Mexican soldiers; and I know this committee, when they correctly understand this matter, will draw no distinction.

The second amendment I propose is this: that when under the provisions of this act of 1850, there shall be no minor heir or widow surviving to draw the share the deceased soldier was entitled to, then his other heirs shall draw such share. The provision that was made in the law granting bounty lands to Mexican soldiers, was right and applicable at that time, confining the bounty to the minor heirs and widow, for these soldiers were then fresh, as it were, from the battle-field. There were fathers, mothers, widows, or minor heirs in the greater part of these cases; but who would claim that this should have any application to those who served in the wars of Wayne, St. Clair, Harmer, or the last war with Great Britain? The policy of granting bounty lands has been already adopted and sanctioned by this Government. Why shall we not, then, equalize the benefits of these acts, and extend the same provision to the soldiers of 1791, under St. Clair; of 1793 and 1794, under Wayne, to the soldiers under Harmer, and those in the war of 1812?

Let me tell you a single fact. At a meeting last fall, when the citizens of western Ohio and eastern Indiana gathered up and reentered the bones of the five hundred who had fallen in St. Clair's defeat, those who had been engaged in that battle were invited to join in the procession, but there was not one there ready to respond to the call. When the children of those hardy veterans were called upon to fall into the procession, you see but the number of forty or more. Now, I ask you if these men are not equally entitled to the benefits which you give to those who served in your subsequent wars? I claim that they are.

Who will pretend to deny that those who marched from North Carolina; that the regiment of bold Kentuckians who crossed the Ohio, and marched out through the wilderness one hundred miles to that fatal battle-field—are not equally entitled, I will not say to the benefit of this Government, but honest payment for their services? If they do not live to enjoy the benefit of the bounty, give it to the nearest of kin—to the persons upon whom the soldier would confer it, if he were living, and which the law would give them in relation to any other estate. I hold that it is a payment of service for which this Government professes, and intends by its laws to provide for. The third section provides for the cases, in relation to which I have obtained information from the Secretary of the Interior. It is a provision for those cases where the applicant dies during the pendency of his application.

The amendment I propose provides that the benefits of the bounty land act shall inure to the widow or children of the officer or soldier, the same as if he had been deceased at the passage of the act. It does not require a new application. The rules of the Department now require that a new petition should be filed. This third section simply reinstates the provision which was adopted by the Department under the law, giving bounty land to the Mexican soldiers. I would ask for a division, so that we may vote upon this matter understandingly. I believe it is understood that the committee will adopt these amendments.

The question was then taken, and a count being had, there were—ayes 49, noes 35—no quorum voting.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. MASON, of Kentucky, and FULLER, of Maine, were appointed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. It is obvious that there is not a quorum present, and I therefore move that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order of the House, being joint resolution No. 1 of the House, explanatory of the act approved September 28th, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," and had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion by Mr. FOWLER, The House then adjourned.

NEW JERSEY ON THE COMPROMISE.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I present to the Senate certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of New Jersey relative to what are generally called the compromise measures.

One of these resolutions instructs the Senators from that State "to resist any change, alteration, or repeal" of those measures.

It was said by one of my predecessors—the lamented Southard—on presenting to this body instructions with which he had been honored, that, if the New Jersey Senators were not the most learned members of the Senate, they certainly were the best instructed Senators north of Mason and Dixon's line. But, sir, I do not intend, on this occasion, to repeat my dissent to the doctrine of legislative instruction, or to argue that point with the Legislature of New Jersey. I am satisfied that the members of that honorable body, while claiming the right, as the representatives of a free people, to express their conscientious opinion upon national affairs, will also grant to me the same privilege, in the discharge of my high duties as a member of the Senate of the United States; and if I should on this or any other occasion disobey their instructions, it will not be on account of any disrespect for their opinion, but because I cannot permit the opinions of others, however high may be the source from whence they come, to take the place of my own sense of duty and of my solemn convictions of right.

In presenting these resolutions, I will do what I am not in the habit of doing—never before I believe—throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate while I state my own position upon the measures referred to.

It is known to the Senate and to the country that I did not approve of the bill reported by the Committee of Thirteen—called the omnibus bill. I opposed that bill not because I objected to a fair and honorable settlement of the agitating questions embraced within it—for I yield to no man in an earnest desire to relieve Congress and the country from all agitation growing out of the question of slavery in all its forms. I have never willingly engaged in any agitating debate upon that subject; and, when called upon to express my opinions, I have endeavored to treat the subject as a national, and not as a local question.

My objection to that bill was principally confined to the mode and kind of settlement it proposed. I preferred another plan of adjustment. I refer to that proposed by the late President, General Taylor, in his message to Congress upon that subject. I then thought, and subsequent events have strengthened my opinion, that if Congress had received General Taylor's plan of adjustment of these questions, and carried it out in the same liberal and national spirit with which it was proposed, that plan would have been more satisfactory to the whole country than the one which was finally adopted. But let that pass. I do not desire now to indulge in offensive comparisons.

The grand mistake of the omnibus bill, and that which finally defeated it, consisted in the combination of all the measures in one bill. It was this obnoxious feature that drove from its support many of the best friends of adjustment and compromise. It was evident, from the day that bill was reported until its final rejection by the Senate, that the measures combined could not pass; but it was at the same time equally obvious, that there was no day, during all that time, when either of these measures, presented separately, would not have received a majority of the votes of this body.

We all know the history of the omnibus. After six months of labor and toil, it finally fell, crushed beneath its own weight. Then it was that the real work of compromise commenced. I admit that the materials were gathered from the ruins of the omnibus, but their availability consisted in being used upon a new plan of construction. Each measure was taken up separately, according to the plan of settlement proposed in the original resolutions submitted by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. Although this plan also proposed a general system of measures, yet each measure was permitted to stand upon its own merits—thereby leaving every member free to vote upon each, according to the dictates of his own judgment.

The propriety of this course was clearly shown upon the final passage of the separate measures; for it will appear by the Journals that several of the most ardent friends of the omnibus bill voted against, or neglected to vote for, several of the measures which they had supported when combined in that bill, while many of its most violent opponents voted for them in their separate form.

It was this independent course of action—a course which I was in favor of from the beginning—which finally passed these several measures, and secured to the country whatever there is of good or of evil in the compromise.

More than this: it was this separate consideration of each measure that has secured to these laws a moral and a political force and influence which they would have been deprived of if they had been passed in combination. It is this feature, more than any other, which has lulled excitement and caused these laws to be respected and acquiesced in by all parties. No man can now say, with any show of truth, that these laws were the result of combination. Neither can any man, or set of men, assume to themselves the peculiar honor and glory of saving the Union by the passage of these laws; for they were respectively passed by the votes of men of all parties, and in opposition to votes from all classes of politicians. This constitutes the true strength of the compromise, and secures it from repeal. All these laws but two have been executed, and are now beyond the power of repeal. The law abolishing the slave trade in the District and the fugitive slave law are all that can possibly be made the subject of further agitation. The former no one thinks of disturbing. The latter, although threatened with opposition in a few localities, has the acquiescence, if not the approbation, of the country. Nowhere is the question agitated with any seriousness except in legislative halls—exhibiting the strange anomaly of a people upon whom the law operates acquiescing in and sustaining its enactments, while the law-makers are, by these ex post facto agitations, disturbing the sanctities of a law which they themselves created.

I here desire to state my own course with regard to the fugitive slave law.

Before the Committee of Thirteen was raised, and while the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky were under discussion, I expressed, in a speech made here, my opinions and views upon that measure. I then, in substance, said that, owing to a construction which the Supreme Court of the United States had, in a late decision, put upon the law of Congress relative to the surrender of fugitive slaves, and also upon the State laws upon the same subject, it became the duty of Congress to pass some new law, in order to carry out more effectually the requirements of the Constitution; and I then declared my purpose to vote for any proper law that would effect that object. I also on that occasion attempted, in my feeble way, to defend New Jersey against what I considered an imputation upon her honor, that she would not faithfully carry out the requirements of the Constitution. No one, therefore, has the right to charge me with any factious opposition to the fugitive slave law, or to suspect me of a disposition to agitate that subject.

When the Senate finally acted upon that measure, I was confined at my house in New Jersey by sickness. Had I been present on that occasion, I should have preferred the bill presented by the late Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Webster] to the one which passed the Senate. I think that bill would have been more acceptable to the North, and would have secured the rights of the South as effectually as the present law.

But, whatever opposition I may have felt it my duty to make to any or either of the measures embraced in the compromise while under discussion, yet, as soon as they were enacted into laws, it became my duty, as it is the duty of every good citizen, to sustain them with as much fidelity as if I had voted for each and all of them. In saying this, I but express the common sentiment of the people of New Jersey, who have always shown their devotion to our republican institutions by a cheerful submission to the voice of the majority, when that voice is expressed in constitutional law.

I am now opposed to all further agitation upon this subject. The quiet of the country, and even the sanctity of Congress, demand that we should cease our disputations. Sir, my abhorrence to agitation upon this subject is such that it may even carry me beyond my instructions; for I go against agitation on either side of this question—agitation as well by those who were in favor of the compromise as by those who were against it—agitation from the North as well as from the South—agitation in State Legislatures and in the halls of Congress. Of all miserable agitation is agitation after the fact. It is the cry of alarm, after the danger is passed, for the mere love of the excitement. To revive a spent whirlwind that it may blow down a few more trees—to rouse the sleeping lion merely to hear him roar again—may suit the taste of some, but they who indulge in this kind of excitement may find that there is more danger than amusement in the play.

My desire to secure repose and quiet to the country upon this subject will also compel me to vote to lay on the table the resolution offered by the late Senator from Mississippi reaffirming the compromise. I consider that resolution, although not so intended by the mover, an indirect impeachment of the law, throwing doubt upon its supremacy, and opening the door for renewed agitation upon a subject which the country desires should remain at rest.

One of these resolutions declares—

"That New Jersey, one of the original thirteen States, has always adhered to the Constitution, and is inalienably attached to the Union, and that she will resist, to the extent of her ability, any infraction of that sacred instrument."

Mr. President, it was scarcely necessary for the Legislature to declare at Trenton, or for me to repeat the declaration in the Senate of the United States, that the people of New Jersey had always "adhered to the Constitution, and were inalienably attached to the Union." I did suppose that that was a fixed fact, and need not to be re-resolved upon.

Devotion to the Constitution and the Union—one and the same—is a universal feeling in New Jersey—a domestic passion—as pure as the genial air of her green hills, and as notorious as her revolutionary battle-fields. It is written in her history from the earliest annals to the present hour, and it is recorded in the proceedings of the convention which formed the Constitution, where it appears that New Jersey had the honor to make the first suggestion to her sister States which led to the formation of our glorious Union.

Our devotion to the Union will acquire no additional ardor or strength by being embodied in the cold forms of legislative resolutions, for it has an abiding home in the warm heart of every true Jerseyman.

But, sir, our loyalty to the Constitution is not derived from, nor sustained by, the principle stated in the preamble to these resolutions. It is there asserted that the Constitution is a compact between the several States, and that it was established by the States in their sovereign capacities. I will read that part of the preamble:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States is a compact between the several States, and forms the basis of our Federal Union:

"And whereas the said States, through their representatives in sovereign capacities as States, by adopting said Constitution, conceded only such powers to the General Government as were necessary to 'form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to posterity.'"

These are not Jersey words nor Jersey sentiments. They are taken from the vocabulary of another State, and are the teachings of a political school in which the people of New Jersey (if their Senators are) have never been instructed. Our devotion to the Constitution rests upon a foundation deeper and broader than that formed by a mere compact between the States. Our allegiance is to a national Union ordained and established by the people of the United States. This is the Union which the people of New Jersey helped to form. This is the Government which they are ever ready to sustain with free and loyal hearts.

The Legislature of New Jersey will therefore pardon me if, on this occasion, I shall take for my rule of conduct the preamble to the Constitution of the United States in preference to that prefixed to these resolutions.

The resolutions were read.

Mr. STOCKTON. I have also had the honor to receive the resolutions passed by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, which have just been presented by my honorable friend and colleague. Those resolutions, sir, are patriotic and explicit, and need no commendation or explanation or defence from me. Nor is it necessary that I should follow the example of my colleague, and restate my opinions in regard to the important matters of which they treat, further than to say, that I entirely concur in the sentiments which they express. I have heretofore written and spoken as much on this subject as I ought, perhaps, to write or speak on any subject; and if Senators and the country are not sufficiently well informed in regard to my opinions, it certainly is no fault of mine. It would, likewise, be quite superfluous for me to enter upon any vindication of the course which New Jersey has taken in relation to the subject-matter of these resolutions. If, unfortunately, she may, by that course, have alienated from her the affectionate regard of any of her sister States of the North, I can only for her, regret such a result, and say, that what she has done was intended for the welfare of the Union—the whole Union, and nothing but the Union. It was not that "she loved Caesar less, but that she loved Rome more." If the men of the South are not satisfied with her course, all that I will say to them is, that they are hard to please.

Mr. President, it is a subject of regret as well as surprise to me, that the differences of opinion in regard to the construction of the Constitution should continue to excite in the minds of a portion of our fellow-citizens, such strong feelings of bitterness and resentment. Differences of opinion acrimonious and exciting, in relation to the interpretation of the Constitution, are no novelties. Bitter controversies growing out of such diversities of opinion, disturbed the country long since quite as generally as that which is referred to by these resolutions. Happily they were not of long duration. They subsided when the will of a majority of the States became known. Why, sir, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, great diversities of opinion existed among the founders of the Republic. Formidable parties in Massachusetts, in New York, in Pennsylvania, and in Virginia, vehemently opposed its adoption, and in many of the smaller States there were great objections to some of its provisions. It is known that it was not the plan preferred by New Jersey, and differed in many respects from the one presented by that pure patriot and eminent statesman and jurist, Judge Patterson, from New Jersey. But that was the age of self-sacrificing virtue. Our fathers sacrificed their feelings, their personal interests and ambition, to the public safety. They magnanimously acquiesced in the will of the majority of the States, and exerted their best faculties to perfect the Constitution, and to hand it down to posterity as a bond of Union. Following the example of the wise and patriotic founders of the Constitution and their cotemporaries, I can perceive no reason why we should refrain from uniting as they united, in a spirit of generous conciliation, to preserve the Constitution hereafter from infraction, and to restore that harmony and those fraternal feelings which should exist between the different parties to this compact, and which are so essential to its beneficial existence, as well as to the happiness of mankind.

Mr. President, the passage of these resolutions has given me no ordinary satisfaction. They were unanimously adopted in each House of the New Jersey Legislature. They embody the undivided sentiment of that State. There, at least, no dissenting voice is now audible in opposition to the compromise measure. This unanimous declaration of the opinions of New Jersey, is entitled to great respect from the States of this Confederacy. It is a voice from the Flanders of revolutionary America. New Jersey is that State which, more than any other, was the battle-field of the Revolution. And is it too much to expect, that her example should exercise a salutary influence upon Congress, and the whole country for all time? Certainly not, if unsparring sacrifices for the achievement of freedom, and unflinching fidelity in maintaining it, deserve commendation and respect.

Sir, New Jersey has produced her heroes and her statesmen, but not her historian. When her history is written, that will be her eulogy. There is no stain on her escutcheon. Her sons can trace back their ancestry through many generations without finding their blood curdling in the veins of a slave. Her territory was settled by freemen, by men whose pride it was, not only to be free, but just. True to themselves, and true to virtue and patriotism, no foot of her soil was wrenched by fraud or force from the original savage proprietors. The last shadow of an Indian claim, a claim to some reserved hunting and fishing grounds, was voluntarily extinguished by purchase many years ago. She has as much pride in looking back to her colonial as to her national history. In the long struggle with insolent governors and royal prerogative, her people were never driven back one hair line from the assertion and maintenance of all the rights conferred upon them by their original grant; and when the final struggle for independence came, she was then among the first to enter the bloody arena. She threw overboard the Royal Government, and established a free constitution before the Declaration of Independence, and in advance of her sister States, with the exception, I believe, of New Hampshire and South Carolina. Of the part which she took in that memorable struggle, she has memorials which will never perish. Bunker Hill and Lexington and Brandywine and Charleston were glorious, but not altogether successful fields. They wear the laurels of Thermopylae. But the Marathons of the Revolution are in New Jersey. Trenton, Princeton, and Monmouth—commemorate victories. From their bloody fields freedom sprung disenthralled and invigorated. None of the "Old Thirteen" made more costly pledges to the cause of Liberty and the Union. On her territory everywhere may be seen the marks of hostile armies. None of her old household homesteads, but are rich with the legendary tales of plunder and cruelty suffered at the hands of the enemy. Few of her old families, but gave of their best blood to the cause; and when the struggle was ended, she reposed on the sacrifices she had made, and left to others the task of boasting of their achievements. She had performed her duty and was satisfied.

Nor has New Jersey been less true to the Union in peace than in war. Among the first in her exertions to achieve our liberties, she yields to none the palm of superior exertions in maintaining them. When the imperfections of the Articles of the old Confederation became manifest, she was the first to clothe her Commissioners to the Convention at Annapolis, in 1786, with full powers to remodel the whole form of Government. She united with New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia, in giving the first impulse to the movement which produced the Constitution. She was only second to Virginia in sending delegates to the Constitutional Convention; and when the Constitution was formed, she took the lead, with Pennsylvania and Delaware, in its ratification. She was the first, as I stated the other day, to approve the important amendments to the Constitution which secured freedom of religion and of speech, and the right of petition, which have been the safeguards of the States against the encroachments of the General Government. She furnished her full proportion of those great men whose eloquence and wisdom have guided your public councils, and whose heroism has adorned your military annals. The first bright names given to glory in the war of 1812, were those of Pike and Lawrence, true representatives of the Jersey Blues. The first died in the arms of victory at Little York—the other with the memorable words "Don't give up the ship," on his lips. There she is. Though small, comparatively, in territory, she yields to none in honor, virtue, and patriotism. She has never been at your doors begging importunately for her share of the "loaves and fishes." If in the lifetime of this Government, now embracing a period of three generations of men, she has ever had more than two Secretaries of a Department, and one Judge of the Supreme Court, I have forgotten it. She has never had even one foreign Minister. With a long extent of sea-coast, and with an imperfect tide-water navigation running into the heart of the State, she has never received any assistance from the General Government worthy a name, in aid of her harbors and rivers. With her mountains full of iron, zinc, and other minerals—with her territory dotted all over with manufacturing establishments, she has borne without a murmur her share of the injuries sustained from an ever-changing revenue system. It may be truly said of her, that whilst she has borne her full proportion of the burdens of the Government, of its direct benefits she has asked little and received less. Still, there she stands, this day as of old, heart and hand, with her treasure and her resources, and her blood, pledged to a strict construction of the Constitution and to the Union of the States.

In the name of a patriotic, generous, and heroic constituency—aye, sir, if my colleague will permit me to say so—in the name of every man, woman, and thinking child in the State of New Jersey, I place my hand on that sacred instrument, and declare for me and mine, that no letter of it shall be infringed if we can help it—neither by Northern or Southern unwise counsels. If wrongs exist, they must be redressed by law, and according to the Constitution. But this Union of the States—the world's wonder—is the common heritage, as it is the common glory, of all the people of all the States. We must not permit one link of that golden chain to be broken, and the hopes and happiness of mankind, for all coming time, to be blighted in the bud, by wild fanaticism or hasty passion.

The motion to print was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of the late Joseph Pearson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Charles A. Grignon, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of Emilie Hoon to a pension, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill for the payment of outstanding loan office and final settlement certificates issued for money loaned, or for services or for supplies, during the revolutionary war, reported it back without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WALKER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Captain Presley Thornton, deceased; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. FELCH, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize the sale of reserved lands and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEWARD, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution concerning the publication of a compendium of the several censuses of the United States; which was read and passed to the second reading.

COMPENSATION OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CASS, to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the district judge of the United States for the district of Michigan; which having been amended on the motion of Mr. SEWARD, and on the motion of Mr. DAWSON, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the district judge of the United States for the district of Michigan; and the salary of the judge of the northern district of New York; and of the district judge of the State of Georgia.

ENGROSSED BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act to change the times for holding the United States district courts in Alabama, and for other purposes; and

An act authorizing a new register to the American-built ship Obed Mitchell.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

The engrossed bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments, in certain cases," was read a third time.

On motion by Mr. CHASE, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

ENTERTAINMENT OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. SEWARD, in behalf of Mr. SHIELDS, during his absence, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the expenses incurred in the reception and entertainment of Louis Kossuth and suite, during their late visit to the capital, by invitation of Congress, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, when approved by the committee of reception, to an amount not exceeding $5,000.

EXILED IRISH PATRIOTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien, Thos. F. Meagher, and their associates.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

NON-INTERVENTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. CLARKE's resolutions on the subject of non-intervention.

Mr. CLEMENS spoke at length on the subjects embraced in the resolutions. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. MILLER. As I have something to say in regard to these resolutions, and as the subject of them is "intervention or non-intervention," and as I do not wish to intervene between this and other important business under consideration by the Senate, unless some other Senator is ready to speak on this subject, I will move that the further consideration of them be postponed until some day next week—say Tuesday next.

Mr. ATCHISON. If it is in order to amend the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, I will move to postpone the further consideration of these resolutions until the first Monday in April. I do this that the Senate may act upon measures which are now before it, of great importance to the people—practical measures, in some of which the Southwestern and Western people feel a deeper interest than in any other question; especially questions of the kind that are now being discussed. I refer to our land bills.

Mr. MILLER. I think the period proposed by the Senator from Missouri is too long. I should prefer to have the subject postponed for a fortnight.

Mr. SEWARD. The motion to postpone till the first Monday in April, I should regard as equivalent to an indefinite postponement. And regarding the matter in that light, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken, and resulted—yeas 15, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Butler, Downs, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Hunter, Jones, of Iowa, King, Morton, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Spruance, and Underwood—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Boriand, Case, Chase, Clarke, Clemens, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Geyer, Houston, Jones of Tennessee, Miller, Seward, Shields, Smith, Soulé, Sumner, Upham, and Wade—24.

So the motion to postpone till the first Monday in April was not agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me that we ought not to postpone the further consideration of these resolutions to a very distant day; and I would suggest to the Senator from New Jersey, whether it would not be better to fix an earlier day than the one he has named, and dispose of them entirely. I think this practice of taking up a subject and debating it for a while and then postponing it, leads to great delay, and I hope it will suit his convenience to take up this matter on an earlier day than that he has named, and continue it till it is disposed of.

Mr. MILLER. If I consulted my own wishes I would prefer to say Tuesday next. On the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, I will say Tuesday next, if that be agreeable to him.

Mr. BADGER. I hope my friend from New Jersey will vary that motion, though I entirely agree with what has been said by the honorable Senator from Virginia. But here is my friend from Iowa [Mr. Jones] with his bill, to which an unexpected and, to him, distasteful amendment has been proposed, a practical measure in which the State of Iowa is deeply interested, and I really think we owe it to him to dispose of that measure within some reasonable time. I move to postpone the further consideration of these resolutions till this day fortnight.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall be able to dispose of the bill in which the Senator from Iowa is interested long before this day fortnight. It is not necessary to postpone it for that length of time.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. There are three other special orders, which are pressing, practical matters.

Mr. HUNTER. When we take up a measure of this sort, it is better that we should continue to act upon it until it is disposed of. I am willing to postpone this subject long enough to enable the Senate to act finally upon the bill in which my friend from Iowa is so much interested. When it is again taken up, I hope it may be finally disposed of.

Mr. BADGER. In a spirit of compromise, to which my friend from Virginia knows I am inclined, I will vary my motion, so as to postpone the subject till Monday week.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to state, that what is usually denominated the French spoliation bill, was made the special order for Monday next, and I am very anxious that it shall be disposed of next week.

Mr. HUNTER. It is proposed to postpone this question till Monday week.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject till Monday week, was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

On the motion of Mr. JONES, of Iowa, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Underwood to the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BELL. I did not design to occupy the attention of the Senate for a great while. In the few remarks which I intended to submit, I proposed to make this as serious and impressive a subject as I thought it deserved to be. I am taken somewhat by surprise at the motion of my honorable friend from Iowa, but I will attempt to go on, collecting my thoughts as best I may, upon the occasion.

I mentioned the other day that this was a subject of annual discussion. I suppose that it has not been omitted at any session during the last twenty years. It is, therefore, very difficult to throw out any new arguments of much weight or importance on the subject.

Mr. BADGER. I think it is extremely unjust to my friend from Tennessee, to require him to go on now. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I wish to give notice that I shall, to-morrow morning, move to dispense with the consideration of private bills, in order that the Senator from Tennessee may proceed with his speech.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. BADGER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 12, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER, Chaplain to the Senate. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COLONEL MITCHELL.

Mr. EVANS. There is upon the Speaker's table a bill which has passed the Senate, for the relief of Colonel Mitchell. I want the House to allow it to be taken up, and, when I have said a few words about it, refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to it, and call for the regular order of business. Nearly the whole day was lost yesterday by taking up matters by general consent.

Mr. EVANS. I was in hopes there would be no objection.

Mr. JONES. If the House is disposed to take up the business on the Speaker's table regularly, I have no objection to it; but I do object to this taking up of bills out of their proper order.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The House then proceeded with the regular order of business, being the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, from the Committee of Public Buildings and Grounds, moved that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the President and Directors of the Navy Yard Bridge Company; and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VENABLE. I should like to know why that memorial should be referred to the Judiciary Committee. That committee is quite willing to do anything that properly belongs to it, but I do not know that there is any legal question involved in this memorial, or any reason why it should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, rather than to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina submit any motion?

Mr. VENABLE. No, I will let it pass.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee of Claims, reported back the bill from the Senate for the relief of William P. Greene, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. FLORENCE called for the reading of the bill; and it was read by the Clerk.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to refer that bill to the Committee of the Whole House.

I make that motion, because I think it right and proper that all bills of this description should be referred to the committee. It may be that this is a very meritorious claim, but how do we know it? To be sure, we have the assurance of the Committee of Claims; but if the bill is regularly referred, and the report printed, that report will be put in our boxes, and members will come to the House prepared, not only to receive information from the committee which reported the bill, but perhaps to give information, and those who take an interest in the subject will have an opportunity of examining it.

I think the proper and regular course is, that all bills should be referred either to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union or to the Committee of the Whole House. This custom of passing bills as soon as they are reported from the committee, gives an unjust precedence to claims which may have been presented at a much later period of the session than some others which were presented at a very early period of the session, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and which lose their opportunity of consideration because a case subsequently matured is asked to be put upon its passage. I think the proper rule—a rule from which the House should never depart, except for some strong reasons—a rule from which, I think, I myself have never departed—is to refer every bill either to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or, if it is a private bill, to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. KING, of Rhode Island. This bill comes, as I understand it, from the Committee of Claims, with a recommendation that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. DANIEL. No; that is not the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. KING. I thought that was the substance of the gentleman's report.

Mr. DANIEL. The recommendation of the committee is, that the bill do pass, but not that it be put upon its passage now.

I will state to the House, that the facts of the case are very simple, and that the amount is small. But I have not asked that the bill be put upon its passage now, nor have the committee instructed me to ask that any other course shall be pursued in regard to it than that adopted in regard to all claims. My motion should have been to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole House. If, however, anybody is disposed to put it upon its passage, I have no objection to it. The amount is only $350; there is no doubt about the facts, and they say at the Treasury Department that it ought to be paid to this individual as the measurer of salt.

Mr. KING, of Rhode Island. This bill passed the Senate at the last session, but failed to be acted on in this House for want of time. It has passed the Senate again at this session, I believe, by a unanimous vote; and the simple question is, whether we will pay this officer for the services which he performed.

Mr. DANIEL. Upon reflection, I find that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole House. It makes an appropriation.

Mr. KING. Well, I have no objection.

The bill was then referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Henry McLaughlin, of Vermont; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. D. also, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following bills, which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying reports, viz:

A bill for the relief of John B. Rogers, of South Carolina; and

A bill for the relief of Joseph Arnow and Peter Arnow.

Mr. BOWIE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Bernard Todd; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDGERTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John H. Pratt, deceased; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Captain George Simpton, of Galveston, Texas; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the bill from the Senate, now upon your table, relative to making an appropriation for finishing the repairs of the Library. Time is fast passing away, and proposals must be issued for the work.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire that we shall go through with the call of committees.

Mr. ORR. I object to the taking up of that bill. Let us go through with the regular order of business.

Mr. SACKETT, from the Committee of Claims, reported back Senate bill for the relief of Theodore Oflut, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. S., also from the same committee, made an adverse report on the memorial of William S. Foote and Charles Willington, owners of the ship Hylon, asking compensation for losses and damages sustained in consequence of the action of certain United States officers; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. PORTER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the widow and orphan children of Colonel William R. McKee, late of Lexington, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill No. 142, being an act for admitting the hermaphrodite brig Sylphide to registry.

Mr. S. moved to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. KING, of New York. That bill is very simple in its provisions, and I hope it may be put on its passage. It merely asks the privilege of a registry for a vessel.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I certainly prefer that it should be put upon its passage. I will state, that it merely recognizes the privilege of registry for that vessel under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. I withdraw the motion to refer, and move that the bill be now put on its passage.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and, having been read the third time, it was passed.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill 170, being an act making an appropriation in part for the erection of the light-house at Sand Key, Florida.

Mr. S. said: By our rules, that bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but there are special reasons why the bill should be put upon its passage now, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House for that purpose. It makes an appropriation of only $5,000 for the purpose of defraying, in part, the expense of unloading a vessel laden with iron, and lying at the place where this light-house is being built, and for which the Government has no funds. It does not go beyond that. The Government will be obliged to pay demurrage upon the vessel unless this money is supplied. As I remarked, the bill makes an appropriation of $5,000 for the purpose indicated. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage.

The bill was read through.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SEYMOUR. As objection is made I will withdraw my motion to put the bill upon its passage.

The bill was then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of the trustees of the Philadelphia Gas Works; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the memorial of Charles Massey, jr., the representative of Messrs. Eyre & Massey, asking for the refunding of an excess of duty erroneously exacted upon certain brown sugar; which report was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

GRANT OF LAND TO MISSOURI.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill granting to the State of Missouri the right of way and a portion of the public domain, to aid in the construction of certain railroads therein.

Mr. H. said: I hope that this bill will not go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask that the bill be read.

It was read through by the Clerk, as follows:

A Bill granting to the State of Missouri the right of way and a portion of the public domain to aid in the construction of certain railroads therein.

Be it enacted, &c., That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby granted to the State of Missouri, for the construction of railroads from the city of St. Joseph to Hannibal, and from St. Louis to some point on the western line of said State; and said State shall have the right, also, to take necessary materials of earth, stone, timber, etc., for the construction thereof, from the public lands of the United States adjacent to said railroads: Provided, That the right of way shall not exceed one hundred feet on each side of the line of said roads, and a copy of the survey of said roads, made under the direction of the Legislature, shall be forwarded to the proper local and offices respectively, and to the General Land Office at Washington city, within ninety days after the completion of the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby granted to the State of Missouri, for the purpose of aiding in making the railroads aforesaid, every alternate section of land designated by even numbers, for six sections in width on each side of said roads; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of said roads are definitely fixed by the authority aforesaid, sold any section or any part thereof granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by the Governor of said State, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the lands of the United States not contiguous to the tier of sections above specified, so much land in alternate sections, or parts of sections, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, or to which the right of preemption has attached as aforesaid; which lands (thus selected in lieu of those sold, and to which preemptions have attached as aforesaid, together with the sections and parts of sections designated by even numbers as aforesaid, and appropriated as aforesaid) shall be held by the State of Missouri for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than fifteen miles from the line of the road in each case, and selected for and on account of each of said roads: Provided further, That the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied in the construction of that road for which it was granted and selected, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses, and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatsoever: And provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby reserved to the United States from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of the said railroad through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way only shall be granted.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 35.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land which, by such grant, shall remain to the United States, within six miles on each side of each of said roads, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said lands hereby granted to the said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof, for the purposes aforesaid, and no other; and the said railroads shall be and remain a public highway, for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by said State only in manner following, that is to say: that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections on each road, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road, may be sold; and when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that said twenty miles of said road is completed, then another like quantity of land hereby granted may be sold, and so from time to time until said road is completed; and if said road be not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made, and the land unsold shall revert to the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall, at all times, be transported on said railroads, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct.

Mr. HALL continued. It is not my intention, at this time, to trouble the House with a speech. I took occasion, in the early part of the session, to express my views upon the subject embodied in the bill; and I now merely wish to call the attention of the House to the condition of the two roads embraced in it.

Both these roads, or rather, both the companies for constructing these roads, have been chartered by the State of Missouri, and for which she has loaned the credit of the State to the amount of three and a half millions dollars—a million and a half to the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad and two millions to the St. Louis railroad. The St. Louis road is three hundred and fifty miles long, and the Hannibal and St. Joseph road about two hundred miles long. As I said, the State of Missouri has loaned its credit to the amount of $3,500,000, in order to secure the construction of these roads; so that they are not mere visionary affairs, gotten up for the purpose of making capital out of, but they are roads in relation to which the State of Missouri has heretofore manifested a great interest, not only by granting charters and memorializing Congress upon the subject, but by becoming responsible for a large amount of money invested in these works.

But I wish to call the attention of the House to another fact. These roads will not only increase the value of the public domain through which they pass, but, running as they do through the whole State, they furnish an outlet to the great public domain of the West to the Eastern and Southern markets. In this respect, therefore, this bill stands upon more favorable ground than the bill that passed the House in the first session of the last Congress in favor of the Illinois railroad.

But some apprehension has been expressed that while these grants are being made nominally for the State of Missouri, that they are really for the benefit of private individuals. This objection was made a few weeks ago by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWETSER], and by others. I am fully aware of the mischief of permitting large tracts of land to pass into the hands of a few individuals, to be held up fifteen, twenty, or even more years, at exorbitant prices, and thus kept unsettled. I do not believe that the State of Missouri would ever fasten on herself so ruinous a policy.

With the view, however, of removing the objection entertained—that this grant might result in the exclusive benefit of a few individuals—I have endeavored to prepare an amendment, which, in its operation, shall confine this grant exclusively to the State of Missouri, for the benefit of the people of that State, and I therefore ask leave to offer the amendment, which I desire now to be read, and then I will say a few words further.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall not be transferred to any corporation or company, but shall be sold to actual settlers only, in quantities not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres, or one half section, to each actual settler; and the proceeds of such lands shall be faithfully applied by said State to the objects and in the manner hereinafter specified, in such way as to secure the benefits hereinafter made to the people of said State of Missouri."

The purpose of that amendment is to prevent the State of Missouri from transferring the lands proposed to be granted to any company or corporation, and to require them to be sold in small parcels to actual settlers, and then to secure the proceeds in such a manner as to inure directly to the benefit of the people of the State of Missouri. I have endeavored to make it as stringent as I possibly could, and I have now to say to gentlemen of this House, that if the amendment I have offered be not sufficiently stringent for the purpose of securing the object I have in view, and have expressed, then prepare another more stringent, and I will adopt it; for I tell gentlemen I do not want this land to go to corporations or companies, but to the people of the State of Missouri. I want it so disposed of and settled as to result to the benefit of the people at large. I am well aware that the proposition will be made to commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union. I wish to say a word or two in regard to that subject, and then I shall have done. Gentlemen who have any experience in this House know full well, that if this bill is so referred, that will be the last of it, and you will never hear of it again. Therefore I ask it as a favor of this House, if they are not prepared to pass this bill, that they will vote it down and reject it, in preference to committing it to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union. I would infinitely prefer that the bill should be laid upon the table this morning, than to have it committed to that committee. I do not ask the previous question. I do not desire to stifle debate. I am willing that the matter should be debated as long as gentlemen desire. I do not fear investigation. On the contrary, I court it. But if gentlemen are not inclined to debate it, and if they are not prepared to vote for it, I ask it, as a special favor, that they vote down the bill, lay it upon the table, reject it, kill it; but do not refer it to that committee, where we, who know the operation of that committee, know it will be killed effectually.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on—

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to obtain the floor for the purpose of submitting an amendment, which I send to the table.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] yield the floor?

Mr. HALL. I do.

Mr. JONES. Then I claim it.

A Voice. Let the amendment of Mr. PHELPS be read.

The amendment, to come in at the end of the amendment, was read as follows:

"For the support of common schools."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has the floor.

Mr. JONES. I am prepared to say very little upon the subject of this bill at the present time; and I do not think that the House is now prepared to examine or to enter upon its consideration. It is certainly, I think, a very extraordinary request—perhaps a very modest one of my friend from Missouri [Mr. HALL]—to ask that this important bill shall be passed now, without being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as is usual. And here, for fear I may forget it, before I proceed any further, I move that this bill be so referred, and that it be printed. I want the bill, together with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, printed, in order that we may all have an opportunity of examining the bill, and of satisfying ourselves of the principle which is embraced in it, and by which the larger portion of the public lands of the country are to be appropriated for internal improvements by the Federal Government, in violation of the doctrine which I have always understood the Democratic party of this country to be the advocates. I wish to know, I desire that the House may know, the principles which are embraced in this bill. And I should like to hear the advocates of it declare in this House the principles upon which they support it—how it is that they oppose the improvement of the country by means of roads and canals by the Federal Government, and yet will divert the entire public domain from its heretofore legitimate object, and vest it in the States, to be held—whatever may be the phraseology of the law—for the benefit of chartered companies, by companies incorporated by the different State Legislatures.

I would like particularly for the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to inform the House how many acres of land he proposes to dispose of by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HALL. I will answer the gentleman, that this law embraces two roads. One of the roads will receive less than five hundred thousand, and the other will receive about a million of acres, being together about one half the quantity granted to the State of Illinois the last Congress.

Mr. JONES. A grant of one and a half millions of acres in this bill! Now, I would ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] how many bills of this character he has now before his committee, and ready to be reported, whenever this one shall have been favorably disposed of by the House?

Mr. HALL. I will answer that question. I believe the committee have agreed to report some ten or twelve bills, which will comprise, according to the nearest estimate we can make, between five and six millions of acres.

Mr. JONES. Then, sir, here is this bill, which is to dispose of one million and a half of acres of land, as we are told by the chairman of the committee who reported it, put forward—and perhaps it embraces a larger amount of land than any other of these bills referred to—as the one upon which a trial is to be made; and if this one can be passed, other bills are now ready, as agreed upon by the Committee on Public Lands, to be reported, disposing of some six millions of acres of public lands for similar purposes. Now I ask you, if, in your long experience upon this floor, you have ever known a bill of equal importance as this—disposing of as much of the public property as this proposes to do—brought in here and put upon its passage without even being printed, or even being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. HALL. I only wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact, that the Illinois bill, which granted to that State double as much land as is proposed to be granted by this bill, never was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but was passed in the House.

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the gentleman from Missouri voted upon that Illinois bill, but he did not at the time very well approve of the manner in which it was passed here. He thought it should have taken the regular course. If his bill is right, I suppose that, in this House of honest men and faithful representatives, he can secure a majority for it; but if it will not stand the test of investigation, it should not pass. If it is right in itself, he should have no fears of its success, let it take what course it may, upon the motion which I have made.

Mr. HALL. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he does not believe that if this bill is committed to the Committee of the Whole House upon the state of the Union, it will be the last of it—that it will never be reached again this session?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. I say, for the information of the gentleman—though that is unnecessary, because he is apprised of the fact—that the rules of this House require the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union to take up the Calendar in its order, with the exception, perhaps, of appropriation bills; and you must call the first bill upon it, and to lay it aside a motion must be made, and sustained by a vote of a majority of the committee. But there will be important bills—not appropriation bills—reported to this House before the termination of this session, which will go to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union; and, in order to get at them, this House, or the Committee of the Whole, will be compelled to pass to the consideration of this bill in order to reach them.

Mr. HALL. Do not the special orders take precedence of these bills?

Mr. JONES. The special order overrides all other business, because it is a suspension of all your rules which prescribe the order of business. But let the gentleman and the House oppose the making of special orders; and, in my opinion, unless there be some good, sufficient, and urgent reason why special orders should be made, we should not make them, but rather let the ordinary business of the House take its course according to the rules prescribed for the government of this House.

That bill, I believe, has been printed; but I suppose there are but few members of the House, except those upon the Committee on Public Lands, and those particularly interested in getting these lands appropriated for their roads, who have examined it or know its provisions.

It is impossible that members, sitting in their places in this House, can understand, by the mere reading of a bill by the Clerk at your desk, the provisions contained in it, especially such important ones as are found in this. I think the gentleman himself, upon reflection, will withdraw his request to pass the bill, and ask the House to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed. In that case we shall all have an opportunity to examine it, and determine for or against it, upon its merits.

Mr. PHELPS. It was my intention to have proposed an amendment to the amendment submitted by my colleague, but I suppose, in the present stage of the question, I am precluded from doing so. I will inquire of the Chair if an amendment can now be offered?

The SPEAKER. An amendment is in order, if pertinent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will withdraw the motion for reference until the gentleman can submit his amendments, and then will renew my motion.

Mr. PHELPS. I then submit the following amendment, to come in at the end of that proposed by my colleague:

"For the support of common schools in said State."

Mr. JONES. I renew my motion to commit the bill and amendment, and that they be printed.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the bill which is now before the House may not be committed. I am convinced in my own mind that if it is referred to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, owing to the press of business and the urgent necessity for the consideration of important appropriation bills that will hereafter come up, it will never be reached. It may become necessary at some time then to discharge the committee from its consideration, and it will then be brought before the House for action. There is no disposition on the part of those who advocate the passage of this measure, or others of a similar description, to stifle inquiry, or discussion. At the commencement of this session, when a discussion took place upon the reference of the President's message, my colleague took occasion to develop his views in relation to bills of this character, and the reasons why they should be adopted. I was in the hopes then that those who opposed these measures would have debated the public land system generally, and that we should then have had presented to us the various propositions which were intended to be submitted, in relation to the disposal of the public domain and the peculiar views of gentlemen. In this I was disappointed.

I say that a reference of this measure to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I consider equivalent to its defeat. Cannot we discuss this bill as well in the House as in the Committee of the Whole? In the committee members are not confined to the discussion of the question pending; and I think, therefore, in point of economy, so far as time is concerned, that it is best the measure should be discussed in the House.

But the gentleman from Tennessee assails the proposition, and wishes to know how we can advocate the disposal of the public land in the way proposed in this bill, when opposed to the appropriation of money for the construction of works of internal improvement by the Federal Government. By the granting of lands to the character of works indicated in this bill, the value of the Government land contiguous is enhanced and its sale rapidly accelerated. Not only are individuals benefited by such grants, but the States also. The State in this case aids in the construction of works which improve the value of the land belonging to the United States. The Government of the United States is the proprietor of a large portion of public land through which this road passes.

Mr. FULLER. If that is the ground upon which the gentleman bases this claim, why is it this bill provides that in case there is no public land of the Government within the range of six miles on each side of the road, other distant lands may be selected?

Mr. PHELPS. I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman. It provides that if the sections donated to the State have been sold, that the agents of the State shall have the right to select other lands in lieu of them within fifteen miles on each side of the road. What are the other provisions in that bill? They are, that upon these railroads shall be transported the mails at prices to be determined upon by Congress. The whole question of compensation is left to the discretion of Congress. It also provides that the munitions of war shall be transported upon these roads free of cost. The amount that the Government would be compelled to pay for the transportation of munitions of war and of troops over these roads, otherwise, annually would greatly exceed the interest upon the proceeds of the lands which it is proposed to grant to the State of Missouri, were they sold. How is it that supplies to New Mexico and Utah are forwarded? They are now carried entirely through Missouri. The expense for the transportation of property of the United States upon that river during the Mexican war were enormous. I think there were some steamboats laden with munitions of war belonging to the Government of the United States which became a total loss. The amount of Government property lost was estimated at something like $200,000.

I again say, that there is ample remuneration to the Government of the United States, for the privilege given to the State of Missouri for the selection of other lands within fifteen miles of the road, should those along the line of the road have been disposed of.

I trust that the inquiries of my friend from Maine are now answered. It is upon these principles that we justify it. I will proceed now to remark, that as the Government of the United States is the proprietor of the greater part of the public land through which these roads will pass, and that as the construction of these roads will enhance the value of those lands, and accelerate their sale, that it is the duty of the General Government to make the donation of lands proposed. I recollect well the time when it was proposed in this House, to graduate and to reduce the price of the public lands. Instead of diminishing the revenue, which would be derived by the Government from the sale of these lands, it was on the contrary increased. We had a remarkable example of that in the case of the Indian reservation within the limits of the State of Mississippi. Certain lands were reserved there for the Indians, no better than the other lands belonging to the Government of the United States, the price of which was graduated and reduced after being offered for a certain length of time in the market. They were in the course of some five or six years all sold, realizing to the Government an average amount of $1 25 per acre. I then say, that the construction of these roads will accelerate the sale of lands upon the line of that road.

A recognizance was made of the road leading from St. Louis to the western line of the State. Some two or three different roads were surveyed. After having gone westward some hundred miles or upwards through a section of country where the land was some ten miles from timber, the Government lands on each side were all taken up in consequence of that survey. The expectations of those purchasing the lands was, that the road would be constructed upon the line of that survey. I hold in my hand a statement of the receiver of public moneys of the Clayton land district, in my Congressional district. It is the district through which this survey was made. The total receipts of that land office for the year 1849, for cash sales, were $36,270. In 1850 the sales amounted to $59,425; and for three quarters of the year 1851, the sales amounted to $101,000. These increased sales are to be entirely attributed to the fact, that it was expected the road would pass through that district. It is true that there was a great sale of public lands to emigrants who came to that State to settle there. The number of emigrants to that State is about the same each year, and hence you cannot account for the accelerated sale of these lands except by the fact that the persons purchasing these lands believed that they would be greatly enhanced in value by the construction of that road, and that the road was to be constructed upon the survey thus made. I say, then, if gentlemen will take upon themselves the trouble to make a calculation of the present value of lands, considering that we have public lands which have been in market for twenty-five or thirty years unsold in a certain district of country, they will find that the Government will be the gainer by giving away one half for the purpose of selling the other half in one, or two, or three years. It is a question which every man may calculate for himself, and—

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interposing.) I ask the Chair if the morning hour has not expired.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STANTON moved to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table; which motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The Speaker laid before the House the following messages heretofore received from the President of the United States, viz:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:
I transmit herewith a copy of the annual report of the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, showing the operation of the Mint and its branches for the year 1851.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1852.

On motion, the said message and accompanying documents were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of the Interior, containing a report from Thomas U. Walter, Architect for the erection of the Capitol.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1852.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved that the message be referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HOUSTON. This communication is upon the subject of expenditures upon the Capitol. It should therefore properly go to the Committee of Ways and Means, who have charge of the subject already. I make that motion.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Alabama is mistaken. The communication belongs properly to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

The question was taken first on the motion to refer to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds, and agreed to.

THE STEAMER PROMETHEUS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a copy of the instructions dispatched from the Department of State to the Minister of the United States at London respecting the attack on the United States steamer "Prometheus," in the harbor of San Juan de Nicaragua, by the British brig of war "Express," and also a copy of the dispatches of Mr. Lawrence to that Department, and of his correspondence with Her Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the same subject.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1852.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, it was ordered, that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be printed.

The Speaker also laid before the House the following Executive communications, viz:

I. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from that Department to the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of custom-houses in the course of erection, or authorized to be constructed; which, on motion by Mr. Houston, was, with the accompanying documents, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

II. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to certain bonds of the State of Arkansas, held in trust for the Chickasaw Indians, and submitting an estimate for one year's interest thereon; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

III. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two communications from the Secretary of the Interior, covering estimates for running and marking the northern boundary of Iowa; and also for expenses in connection with the geological surveys and reports made by Messrs. Foster and Whitney; which, on motion, was, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

IV. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of the official Army Register, for the year 1852; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

V. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with law, a copy of a contract for mail transportation between Charleston, South Carolina, and Havana; also, a statement of the amount of postages derived therefrom; also, a copy of the contracts entered into with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for an increase of service; which said letter and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

VI. Also, a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting information in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 26th ult., relative to the allowance since 1849 of claims heretofore disallowed or suspended; which, on motion by Mr. Fuller, of Maine, was, with the accompanying documents, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

KOSSUTH AND EUROPEAN LIBERTY.

The SPEAKER. I am charged with the presentation to the House of the proceedings of a meeting held in the Capitol at Albany, New York, in relation to Kossuth and European liberty.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Let us hear what it is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask that it be read.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is very long.

Mr. BAYLY. I will suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that there is a very long string of resolutions, which will take the Clerk an hour to read.

Mr. SWEETSER. I call for a division on the proposition to lay upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS. Is it a memorial or resolution? What is its nature?

The SPEAKER. There are several resolutions and one or two speeches in the paper.

Mr. STEPHENS. Where does it emanate from?

The SPEAKER. Albany, New York.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask for the reading of it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, withdrew his motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I withdraw the call for the reading of the paper.

The question was then taken, and the paper was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following bills from the Senate; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

No. 38. An act for the relief of M. K. Warrington and C. St. J. Chubbs, executors of Captain Lewis Warrington and others; referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

No. 55. An act to relinquish to the State of Iowa the lands reserved for salt springs therein; referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

No. 111. An act for the relief of William A. Richmond; referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

No. 137. An act to confirm the claim of John Ervin to a certain tract of land in the Bastrop Claim; referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

No. 150. An act for the relief of Francis P. Gardner; referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

No. 171. An act for the relief of Jane Irvin; referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL MITCHELL.

Senate bill No. 161, for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell, of the State of Missouri, was then taken up in its order, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Why not pass that bill?

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of their Secretary, ASBURY DICKINS, Esq.]

Mr. EVANS. I have no objection to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs; but in two or three minutes I can explain its nature to the House.

The SPEAKER. No motion was made to refer.

Mr. EVANS. I make a motion to put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. DANIEL. I object.

The bill was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It contains an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill must be referred.

Mr. EVANS. If the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole, I do not propose to discuss it.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the Speaker decide that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides.

Mr. EVANS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to put it upon its passage.

Mr. DANIEL. I object, and move to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. EVANS. I have the floor upon it at any rate. Harmony was a Santa Fe trader—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a motion to refer?

Mr. EVANS. I am speaking to the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL], to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DANIEL. I submitted the motion that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and not the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EVANS. Harmony was a Santa Fe trader. He had a large number of wagons, containing valuable merchandise, which he was conveying on the route between Santa Fe and Chihuahua. Colonel Doniphan's force took possession of these wagons, partly, I believe, for the use of the army of the United States, and partly to prevent Harmony's further advance. Colonel Mitchell was the officer who executed the command of Colonel Doniphan. Harmony came before the last Congress and asked for relief, and it has uniformly reported in his favor. I think a bill for his relief passed through this House, and once through the Senate, but it never passed both Houses at the same session; of this, however, I am not certain, and it is of no consequence. Harmony told me himself, that he was tired of this sort of business, and could not afford to come to Washington and run after the Houses of Congress, but intended to go West and sue Colonel Mitchell. He did bring a suit against him, recovered the sum of $97,000, and I am informed that he is about to levy an execution on the property of Colonel Mitchell. This property will be sacrificed, unless we move in this matter rapidly. If that execution be levied, the whole amount of the bill will not by any means compensate Colonel Mitchell for the damage which he will have suffered. Every one knows that a sheriff's sale must be for cash. You do not sell there upon credit; at least it is not so in my State, nor by the common law. Colonel Mitchell's property must be sacrificed if a cash sale take place, and unless we pass the bill now, we cannot indemnify him with $97,000. If we do not pass it, there will be another claim by Colonel Mitchell for the sacrifice upon his property, perhaps to the amount of $97,000 more. Colonel Mitchell was only obeying the command of his superior officer, and ought clearly not to suffer.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. What court rendered judgment against him?

Mr. EVANS. The United States court in Missouri.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Harmony is a resident of New York. Colonel Mitchell, while traveling in the State of New York, was served with a process from the district court of the United States, and judgment was rendered against him by the United States court over which Judge Nelson presides.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will state, that all chance of appeal has been cut off, from the fact that Harmony sent the record of the judgment he obtained in New York, to Missouri, and there obtained a judgment upon the record against Mitchell, at St. Louis, where his property lies.

Mr. EVANS. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House any longer. I merely wanted to make an explanation. If the House chooses to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, let it go; but I am afraid we shall have more to pay hereafter than we should have now.

Mr. VENABLE next obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. DANIEL. A remark made by the gentleman from Maryland, was calculated to produce some mistake as to the action of the different branches of Congress in regard to this matter. I understood him to say that the whole amount of this judgment had been heretofore reported on in one or the other branch of Congress. Now the amount which the Military Committee of the last Congress thought ought to be awarded was only some $30,000; and if by any failure to make a proper defence, the claimant has suffered a larger sum to be recovered, I see no moral obligation resting on the Government to pay it.

Mr. VENABLE. I desire to make but a single remark. I have examined this case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single remark?

Mr. VENABLE. I will yield the floor in a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I merely desire to make one statement in reference to what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] has just said.

Mr. VENABLE. Very well, I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. During the last Congress, when the claim of Harmony was presented, it went to the Committee on Military Affairs, and was referred to me by that committee. I reported a bill, which will be found among the papers of the last Congress, allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle with him for the goods he had lost, as he alleged, by the orders of the Government, through its officer in New Mexico or Chihuahua, limiting the amount, however, to $30,000. Mr. Harmony claimed at one time $60,000, but he was content to receive $30,000, and said that amount would cover his entire loss. These facts were known, I think, to all the members of the Military Committee of the last Congress. The bill for the relief of Harmony failed, and a suit was then instituted against Colonel Mitchell. Now, the fact at which I wish to arrive is this: whether he made a proper defence when he was sued.

Mr. VENABLE. If I am correctly informed, these are the facts: That upon the suit being brought against Colonel Mitchell, he informed the Department here of it; that the suit was tried in New York, and that the United States District Attorney defended the suit; that the Department here provided means for the defence of the suit; that it was contested inch by inch; and that damages were recovered by Harmony against Colonel Mitchell.

Mr. BISSELL. Those are the facts. I was in New York at the time.

Mr. VENABLE. The former Secretary of War, Governor Marcy, was the counsel of Mitchell. The case was thoroughly investigated, and upon being investigated Mitchell was held liable for having obeyed the orders of Colonel Doniphan, in seizing the property of Harmony. The Government defended the case by the ablest counsel that could be obtained—Governor Marcy, and a verdict was obtained against Mitchell. A copy of the record was then carried to St. Louis, and there again the United States District Attorney defended the case, but judgment was recovered against Mitchell a second time, and the whole of his property is under execution. So that it will amount to the entire confiscation of the property of a deserving man for simply obeying his superior officer. If any gentleman will take the trouble to examine the report of the Senate, or the papers in the case, they will find that this meritorious gentleman, Colonel Mitchell, was, by the command of Colonel Doniphan, placed in a position in which he must either be broken for disobeying his superior officer, or crushed and sacrificed for obeying his orders.

Mr. BISSELL. What the gentleman from North Carolina has stated in regard to the facts of this case is strictly true. I chanced to be in New York myself during the progress of the trial, and I know that the suit was contested inch by inch, and that judgment was obtained against Mitchell in spite of the most able and energetic defence.

Mr. PHELPS. In addition to the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina, I will say, that whilst the suit brought by Harmony against Mitchell was pending in the city of New York, under the direction of the District Attorney of the United States, who was engaged in the defence of Mitchell, commissioners were sent to Missouri for the purpose of obtaining the depositions of witnesses who were in Doniphan's regiment at the time of the alleged impressment of the property. Every opportunity was afforded to enable a proper defence of the suit to be made, and after judgment was rendered in the United States court in the city of New York against Mitchell, the advice of the present Attorney General of the United States (Mr. Crittenden) was taken upon the question, whether it was advisable to take the case to the Supreme Court of the United States or not? and I am informed, that on an examination of the matter, the Attorney General gave it as his opinion that it was useless to prosecute the case further.

Mr. BISSELL. I have very little to add to what has already been stated, and I shall be very brief.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, (interrupting.) I desire to know whether any bill of exceptions was taken during the progress of the trial, either to the admission or rejection of testimony or to the ruling of the court below?

Mr. BISSELL. I cannot inform the gentleman whether any bill of exceptions was taken or not.

Mr. PHELPS. If not, it was the fault of the District Attorney.

Mr. BISSELL. If not, it was the fault of the very ablest of counsel. I presume that if there was any propriety in taking such a bill of exceptions, it was done.

But, sir, I was going on to say, that if there has been any bill before us on which we ought to take prompt action, it seems to me this is one. There never was a more honest man, more deserving officer than Colonel Mitchell, and his fidelity to his country alone has placed him in a position where he is in imminent hazard of being utterly ruined pecuniarily. The passage of this bill can alone save him. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SWEETSER next obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. RICHARDSON, who said: I desire to say, that in the remarks which I made a few moments ago, I intended to express no hostility to this bill. The claim of Harmony was not a good one against this Government. That is perfectly clear. The claim, except for some $1,900, the value of mules taken by the Government and put in the wagon trains, is not a good claim, for this reason—the goods that he alleges were taken out of his possession by Colonel Mitchell, were restored to him when the army reached Chihuahua, and he assumed the ownership of them for some ten days, and sold some of them. When it was determined that the army should leave there, he abandoned the goods. After the trespass had been committed, therefore, as he alleged, he waived the trespass by assuming the ownership of the goods and disposing of a portion of them.

Mr. BISSELL. Pardon my colleague, if it was not proved that the goods were so damaged as to be nearly or quite worthless?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think not. He received them from Mitchell under protest, not because they were damaged, but because he was not permitted to take them where he desired to go.

I wish to add, in connection with this matter, that under all the circumstances, I think Mitchell ought to be indemnified. Judgment has been obtained against him for the discharge of his duty as an officer of the United States, and the Government cannot do otherwise than indemnify him.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to propound a question to him? I am desirous to vote for this bill, if I can get a little difficulty removed out of my way.

Mr. SWEETSER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this bill, so far as the gallant Colonel Mitchell is concerned; on the contrary, I am in favor of affording him the most prompt and ample relief.

[Here a number of gentlemen rising for the purpose of making remarks, and asking questions, Mr. SWEETSER said that he would yield to his friends in due time; but they must permit him first to call the attention of the House and the country to the alarming principles involved in the assumption of facts upon which this bill is predicated.]

It is assumed that Colonel Mitchell, a lieutenant-colonel in the army of the United States in the war with Mexico, was ordered by Col. Doniphan, his superior officer, to take possession of certain merchandise, the property of a trader, in order to prevent the same from falling into the hands of the Mexicans; that he obeyed the order of said Doniphan, and took the possession of the property, amounting to about seventeen thousand dollars, which property was abandoned by the owner, and destroyed, or lost, by the army, and that the owner has prosecuted Colonel Mitchell, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New York; that said Mitchell gave the Government at Washington notice of the prosecution, and that Governor Marcy, late Secretary of War, was employed, and conducted the defence on the part of Colonel Mitchell, and that the case was pertinaciously litigated, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; that a judgment has been recovered against Colonel Mitchell for the enormous sum of ninety-seven thousand dollars, or thereabouts, a transcript of which judgment has been taken to Missouri, and a judgment there rendered upon the record; that execution has been issued and levied upon Colonel Mitchell's property, which is about to be sacrificed, in discharge of said judgment, &c., as aforesaid rendered; that the relief sought by this bill is absolutely necessary in order to save Colonel Mitchell's property from sale and sacrifice; that the necessity for the passage of this bill is so urgent that all the usual forms of legislation should be dispensed with; and that the House, by unanimous consent, should now put this bill upon its passage; and that all remedy by appeal or writ of error is lost to Colonel Mitchell. That he must be sacrificed for an act which was done in the line of his duty, in strict conformity with the order given by his superior officer, in a time of war, in an enemy's country.

This bill involves a grave and important question—a question that has aroused all my sensibilities; and whilst I am willing to make the most ample relief to Colonel Mitchell, I must be permitted to express my surprise and alarm at the principles it involves. Sir, I call upon the legal talent of this House to scrutinize this matter, and speak out upon the principles involved.

Has this Administration been guilty of such neglect, a want of proper care and attention to the interests of its officers in a time of war as to permit a subordinate officer to be sacrificed in the manner indicated? If it has, I charge the Administration with a neglect of its duty to the Government, to the injured citizen, and as unfit to manage the affairs of the country in accordance with known and well-settled legal principles, which are essential to the very preservation of the Government itself.

I call upon the legal gentlemen upon this floor to sustain me in demanding for an officer in the army, in a time of war, who executes and obeys the orders of a superior, the same immunity which attaches to a judicial officer in the honest discharge of duty, within the scope of his jurisdiction. I assert and maintain, that in the case admitted before the House, no judicial tribunal on the face of the earth, of any character, could have mistaken the well-settled law on the subject of military and judicial immunity. There is no principle so important and vital to the well-being of a country as the sustaining of all officers, either military or judicial, in the discharge of high and important military and judicial duty.

Mr. Speaker, I confess I feel alarmed when I reflect, that at this time, we have presented to our American Congress a case like the one now before us. It strikes at the very foundation of all government, and, if permitted, will subject men in the honest discharge of public duty, to pains and penalties which, in their consequences, will render all such functions hazardous in the extreme. It cannot be that this case has ever been fairly presented and litigated as it should have been, considering such important considerations.

Sir, I cannot believe that the highly-respectable tribunal referred to, have adjudicated such grave questions, and determined the law as seems to be admitted on this floor. This Administration being charged with the defence of this case, are responsible to the country for any and all violations of duty or principle in relation thereto. I call upon them to vindicate themselves to the country, and to vindicate the principle of military and judicial immunity. I call upon them to answer to the country, for permitting Colonel Mitchell to be harassed by a lawsuit, for an act which was done in the discharge of duty, and in obedience to the command of a superior officer.

Why has this matter rested for so long a time, until a bill is predicated upon a recovery of a judgment for $97,000, in a case where but about $17,000 of property was lost? Why has this Administration suffered the dignity of the Government, the majesty of the law, to be thus prostrated and outraged in the person of a gallant officer, who sustained the flag of his country in time of war? I demand, why all this, with some of the first legal men of the country at the head of that Administration?

Sir, the blunders of the Administration were sufficiently apparent in the unfortunate Cuban proclamation; in the prosecution of the Christiana murderers for high treason. I will not suffer this opportunity to pass without calling the attention of the House and the country to these matters.

I again invoke the attention and aid of the legal gentlemen of this House to the consideration of these momentous questions, and must be permitted to say, that since I have been honored with a seat on this floor, I have not witnessed with so much surprise and alarm any question that has come before the House for its action.

Sir, let us pause and consider well what we are doing, before we sanction the doctrines embodied in this bill; at least, let us raise our voices and call the attention of the country to the facts and principles involved, before we sanction even a bill for the relief of Colonel Mitchell, to be regarded as an acquiescence in the action of the Government.

It has been said by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL], that Colonel Mitchell has no remedy other than the passage of this bill.

The gentleman is mistaken; there is not a respectable judge in Christendom who would not order a stay of execution in the case admitted, if an appeal had been perfected or a writ of error allowed. I do not know how this matter has been litigated if the facts are as stated. A plea in bar would have raised the legal defence, or if the judge ruled erroneously on the trial, a bill of exceptions would have laid the foundation for adequate relief. And, sir, I repeat, there is not a respectable judge in Christendom that would not have ordered a stay of execution upon the judgment in Missouri, until the appeal or writ of error had been disposed of.

The gentleman is mistaken. I cannot believe that this case is one that should be summarily disposed of. Let us have a full hearing, and place responsibility where it properly belongs.

Above all, let us vindicate the principles of law, which are essential to the maintenance of Government, and place just responsibility where it justly belongs.

Sir, I shall shrink from no responsibility, in placing upon the heads of delinquents proper censure, nor shall I fail to call the attention of this House and the country, now, and at all times, to the alarming disclosures which seem to be admitted in this case.

I desire to be distinctly understood, that I shall give my vote with great pleasure for a bill that will fully indemnify Colonel Mitchell; and it is not my wish to procrastinate the passage of this or any suitable bill for that object.

I will now yield the floor to my honorable friend from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] for explanation.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I want to make a simple reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SWEETSER. I promised to yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] and I will now yield it.

Mr. HALL. No one was more strongly opposed to the passage of the bill for the relief of Emanuel Harmony, when it was before the House, than myself. I believed it was a claim which was entirely unjust and should not have been allowed. But a district court of the United States have made a investigation into this case, and have made a decision differently from what I had supposed to be the law, and there has been a judgment rendered against a citizen of my own State. If gentlemen will take the pains to examine into the evidence before the House, they will find that all Colonel Mitchell had to do in the case was this: Harmony had a wagon-train of goods proceeding to Chihuahua. The officer in command, however, thought fit to detain him—as the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. WRIGHTMAN] can testify—and Colonel Mitchell, in obedience to that command, did detain him. That is all Colonel Mitchell had to do in the matter—that is the extent of his instrumentality in the case.

Now, as to the question put by the gentleman from Georgia, as to the propriety of the conclusions arrived at by the court in New York: I was not at the trial, and do not know what was the evidence produced in the case. But I can testify, from a long acquaintance with Colonel Mitchell, that there is not a more honest or a more gallant man in this whole land, than he. He is as gallant a man as there is in the country, and he is as honest as he is gallant. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that he did just what it was his duty to do in relation to this case, and there is no sort of proof to the contrary. When he was about to be sued by Harmony, he informed the Government that he was upon the point of being arraigned for the discharge of his duty as an officer of the Army of the United States. The Government appointed an agent to defend him, and he gave himself no uneasiness about it, because he supposed the Government was able to defend his case. But a judgment was rendered against him in New York. Upon that judgment he was sued in St. Louis, and a judgment was recorded against him in the State of Missouri, and he is now in danger of being ruined for no cause but for doing his duty as an officer in the United States Army—for doing his whole duty in the defence of his country.

Mr. SWEETSER. There is no man upon the floor who will bear testimony to the high character of Colonel Mitchell more willingly than myself. I repeat, that I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the action of the House in relieving that gentleman from the unjust and oppressive judgment which has been rendered against him. But I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the House and the country to the fact, that this Administration has permitted a gallant officer of the Army in the war with Mexico to be stricken down by a judgment against him, in one of the courts of the United States. I ask if there is a man in this House who will get up and sanction the Administration in its conduct in this matter? As I remarked, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this bill, but I rise for the purpose of telling this Administration, and all who are interested in this matter, that if the time has come when an officer, by obeying his superior in a time of war, and preventing property from falling into the hands of the enemy, is, by a form of judicial proceeding instituted, about to be sacrificed and ruined—in a case, too, where he has done nothing but his duty in obeying a command, the disobedience of which would have subjected him to infamy and disgrace—I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise. It becomes this House, it becomes all the legal men of this House, to declare to the country what the course of this Administration has been upon this subject. This Administration, with all its blunders in relation to the Cuban proclamation, and in the prosecution of the Christiana murderers for treason, has enough to answer for. If, with the distinguished man at its head, this Administration permits the rights of an officer to be trampled on in this manner, I say that it becomes this House to protest against it in the most solemn manner, and to take such action, as will place the facts before the country, and let the responsibility fall where it properly belongs. The act of Colonel Mitchell was the act of the Government.

I have no wish to protract the debate at this time. My desire has been to vindicate right and principle fearlessly. I will yield the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have but a few words to say. The question for us to determine is not whether the President has done wrong, or whether the Administration is to be censured or not; but it is, whether Colonel Mitchell, who is about to suffer great pecuniary loss in this matter, shall be relieved or not. That is the question, and I do not intend to travel from it in reply to the gentleman from Ohio. But I would ask that gentleman, in all candor, wherein or how is the President to blame?

Mr. SWEETSER. Not at all.

Mr. STEPHENS. Is the Administration to blame, then?

Mr. SWEETSER. I think so.

Mr. STEPHENS. How? I ask the gentleman, how? Is the Administration to blame for what your courts do? Is the Administration to be held responsible for your district attorneys, even if they have not done right? I ask, has not the Administration done all which is in its power to do when it has furnished the judges, the jurors, and the lawyers, for trying the case?

Mr. SWEETSER. I will answer the gentleman with great pleasure. It may be, as he claims, that the Administration may be excused upon the ground that by furnishing the means of defence it has done all it ought to do; but there is a want of attention, a negligence somewhere, or the rights of this officer would not have been permitted thus to be violated.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman is only repeating what he said before.

Mr. SWEETSER. Well, I will come directly to the point. The fact is, that the district attorney or the Solicitor of the Treasury had control of the appointment of counsel to defend Colonel Mitchell in this case, and I will not yield to any man that he could not have employed such counsel as would have prevented such a judgment as was rendered in this case, and therefore I say the Administration is responsible in the matter, for there are merits in the case which no lawyer will question.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well; the gentleman rises and says there were merits in the case which no lawyer in this House will question, and if the case had been properly presented, that judgment would never have been rendered. Now I am not prepared thus to appear before this House. I am not prepared voluntarily to rise up and say, that there are principles and merits in this case, or any other case, which has been decided by any court of the United States, which shows that it was decided wrong; and that no lawyer will question the error of the decision. In this case I am far from affirming, that no lawyer will call in question the impropriety and error of the court. If I am correctly informed, this case was decided by an able judge, after mature argument by able counsel. Governor Marcy was the counsel for Colonel Mitchell. He is a man of unquestionable ability. He was Secretary of War at the very time when the trespass was committed. He must have known whether Colonel Mitchell was acting under authority or not. Does it become me, or any member on this floor, to stand here and say, that Governor Marcy would stand by and assent to, or yield to, by not excepting to any judgment founded upon principles which any lawyer in this House would say was an outrage? I am not prepared to say that. If the gentleman from Ohio is, he can do so—I am not. But the Administration were certainly not remiss where the interests of the public were in Governor Marcy's hands. I am not prepared to say, that that distinguished lawyer and statesman did not conduct this case with his known ability and fidelity. I am not prepared to say, that he failed to do his duty, or that the judges were corrupt, or that the district attorney was corrupt, or that the jury was corrupt. I am not here to make such charges; nor do I arise now to the correctness of the judgment rendered. That question is not before the House. All that is properly submitted to us is, whether Colonel Mitchell is entitled to the relief asked? The judgment, whether properly or improperly rendered, is about to be enforced. A gallant and faithful officer is about to be ruined, for an act done in the public service, and for what was thought to be the public good; and the only question now before us is, whether we will see him ruined by this loss, or let it be borne by the public? It is of great importance that the bill pass speedily; and the only point now before us is, Shall the bill be put upon its passage? I hope gentlemen will not object to letting us have a vote upon it. This requires unanimous consent. If a vote is now allowed to be taken, gentlemen can vote as they please upon its merits. If any gentleman is opposed to it, let him vote against it. What I want is, that the House, by unanimous consent, may be allowed to pass at this time upon its merits. I see no reason for delay. I think we ought to vote, and vote now. And for myself, I am prepared to vote for the bill.

Mr. MEADE. I rise for the purpose of making a suggestion, more to get the views of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] in relation to it than anything else, and to satisfy myself with regard to it. It seems to me, if the district court of New York was right in the judgment it pronounced that Mitchell acted not by authority of the Government, and that he was a wrong-doer individually. But if that decision was an erroneous one upon principles of law, then I will vote for his relief; but if he was forced to act in obedience to lawful authority, then it was an act which would bar recovery against him. But it seems the court thought he did act without authority. If he acted from authority, the United States is the wrong-doer, and not Colonel Mitchell; and the only remedy for the party aggrieved is by application to this Government. But Mr. Harmony prefers to bring his action against Colonel Mitchell as an individual trespasser; and the court by its judgment—taking things prima facie, for I do not say the judgment was correct—has decided that Colonel Mitchell acted not as the agent of the Government in this matter.

Mr. TOOMBS. The gentleman has mistaken the principle. A person injured has always a right to look to the individual trespasser for compensation, although he may have committed the trespass by the authority of his principal. An act of trespass is always illegal, and—

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman will allow me to proceed. I speak more for information than anything else. I am not inclined to concede the position taken by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS.] I cannot give the authorities, but our books are full of cases of this sort. I will refer to a case against Commodore Stockton, where the owner of a vessel, a few years ago, sued him for seizing his vessel as a slaver, somewhere upon the African coast. In addition to his case, there is one now pending before this Congress, where Lieutenant Biscoe was sued for seizing a slaver, or one suspected of being a slaver, and bringing her to the United States. A libel was filed against the vessel, and the case was dismissed by the district attorney of Massachusetts, as was also the case in the action against Commodore Stockton. Upon the dismissal of the libel, a suit was instituted against Lieutenant Biscoe, in the one case, and against Commodore Stockton, in the other, and the parties failed to recover damages, because the officers were considered by the court, as having probable cause of suspicion, and having acted in obedience to orders from the Government. The cases failed upon the ground that the Lieutenant, in the one case, and the Commodore in the other, were acting by authority, and the individuals aggrieved had no redress.

The court decided in those cases that the plaintiff could not recover against the officers of Government, acting by its authority. And those officers having expended their individual means in the defence of the actions brought against them, applied here to obtain redress. Commodore Stockton was paid the costs of his suit by the Government, and we are prepared to report a bill to reimburse to Lieutenant Biscoe the like expenses.

Now, is the position true or not, that if an officer acts in obedience to the lawful instructions of his Government, he is liable to a suit, as an individual, for acts committed under these instructions? The inferior officer is bound to obey the commands of his superior. The superior officer is presumed to act with authority; and if he acts by authority, I undertake to lay down the position that he is indemnified against the consequences arising out of his obedience to his orders.

A VOICE. Suppose a superior exceeds his authority?

Mr. MEADE. If a superior exceeds his authority, then the case is a different one. Do I understand this is the case at bar? If Colonel Doniphan exceeded his authority, and thereby get Colonel Mitchell into a scrape, I should vote to relieve Colonel Mitchell.

Mr. PHELPS. That was the case.

Mr. MEADE. The question arises, was Colonel Doniphan authorized to issue the order to Colonel Mitchell? If he was, then I say the United States is responsible for the trespass, and not the officer.

A VOICE. That is the case.

Mr. MEADE. If he did not, and if the judgment of the court is an erroneous one; if they ought to have found in favor of Mitchell, upon the ground that he was acting in obedience to authority, I should be in favor of relieving Colonel Mitchell, and in favor of this bill, unless it be made perfectly manifest that he acted wrongfully, without authority, and under circumstances which did not justify him.

I believe I shall vote for the bill after investigating the facts and merits of the case. But there seems to be a difference of opinion in regard to the facts and merits, and I am in favor of inquiring into them, as they have been imperfectly related by the different speakers, and not with that detail which is necessary to enable us to come to a correct decision. I would rather look into the circumstances of this case before I vote, because I do not wish, by hastily passing a bill of this sort, set the example, and say that an officer, who, in obedience to his instructions, commits a trespass, and is afterwards sued for it, and make some loose defence of his case, or neglects it, is justified in coming before the Congress of the United States for indemnity. I wish by a scrutiny of this case to put those officers upon their guard, and require them to make every defence that is necessary, and that they can possibly make. If Colonel Mitchell has done this duty which he owed to himself and to the Government, I will vote for this bill.

Mr. COBB. I am inclined to vote for the bill, if I can, by one or two appropriate answers, get a little difficulty out of the way. I want to vote knowingly. I think that by asking one or two questions I can get the information I desire. Did I understand—I regret that the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] is not in his seat—did I understand him to say that this man was before the last Congress for relief?

Mr. PHELPS. No.

Mr. COBB. I hope I misunderstood him. My understanding was, that Colonel Mitchell asked relief at the last Congress.

Mr. VENABLE. No. Mr. Harmony applied for relief at the last Congress, not Colonel Mitchell.

Mr. COBB. That is the man. That is one of the branches I would like to have explained.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will answer as I understand it. He applied to Congress for relief. He thought he had been outraged.

Mr. COBB. Not Colonel Mitchell?

Mr. STEPHENS. No; Mr. Harmony.

Mr. COBB. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Harmony would not await the action of Congress but sued Colonel Mitchell, and recovered against him.

Mr. COBB. Another question. I am led to believe that Colonel Mitchell obtained possession of a portion of these goods and made use of them. Is that so?

Mr. PHELPS. No, no—that is not so.

Mr. COBB. I am glad of that. [Laughter.] I have always been disposed to tread lightly when I could not see the ground upon which I was going to tread. When this question was first presented my impulse was—as my impulses always are to do justice to every individual coming here and asking for relief—to vote for the bill instantaneously. My mind was misdirected, and I am glad now to know that it was, for without the information I have obtained from the inquiries I have propounded, I should have been obliged to vote to refer the bill for the purpose of getting further information. Gentlemen will allow me to say it is my policy, whenever a case is presented here—one which I believe to be meritorious—to give it speedy consideration, rather than to throw it into that vortex whence nothing comes out. I want direct action upon the bill and I will vote for it.

Mr. WALSH. Allow me to say that a point of law was raised in the case of Harmony vs. Mitchell, which was fully discussed, and I do not understand the court as sanctioning the law as laid down by the learned gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS.] The case was this: It was not one of immediate pressing necessity. This man Harmony was on his way to Mexico with goods, contained in wagons, and Colonel Doniphan, in the exercise of his military discretion, decided that, if those goods should come into the possession of the Mexicans, as they would be likely to do, they would aid them essentially in their defence, and he ordered Colonel Mitchell, with his command, whatever it was, to take possession of the goods in order to prevent that catastrophe. The justification was a military one. Every military man considered it a justification. He was doing his duty as a soldier, and he would have been liable to punishment and rebuke if he faltered. But the court says this is not—looking at it in a technical point of view—a case of immediate necessity, and that that is the test of the responsibility of the party. The question of law is raised before the court, argued before them, and decided upon that ground. I suppose it is technical law, and it is a hard law, against the effects of which this gentleman ought to be saved, and saved at once. It is perfectly manifest, let me say in addition, that the Government took the responsibility of this proceeding, and if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] is right in saying that the Administration is in fault, the sins of the Administration ought not to be visited upon this military officer.

The Government recognized the right of this man; recognized the propriety of his petition, and authorized the legal officer to appear before the New York tribunal, and make a defence. If there is any fault in not taking a bill of exceptions, it is not that of this soldier, who should not be visited with the faults of the lawyers or of the Administration.

If we do not defend this man, it will be very much like a case in the English books, where a very grave matter was debated, before the courts in regard to a capital offence, and the authorities say the judges never publicly proclaimed their opinion, but the prisoner was hung.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The decision of this case by the court, I understand to be upon the ground stated by my colleague, [Mr. TOOMBS,] and which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] seems to think was an error, as also the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE.] Mr. Mitchell was there and pleaded the instructions under which he acted, and the court in New York held that such a plea was no justification, and overruled it; and in doing so sustained the principle that my colleague [Mr. TOOMBS] states—that is, that it is no plea, and no justification, and that he is liable alone as an individual.

I did not intend, in the remarks I made, to be diverted into an argument upon the merits of this case. Hence I arose barely to present to this House a naked case to let them look at. Here is a man injured, whether rightfully or wrongfully; and he comes here with clean hands himself, and the question is, Shall this House grant relief? I hope this bill may be put upon its passage, and then we can vote as we please.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the previous question upon the motion to refer.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the Chair first ask the unanimous consent of the House to put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. HOUSTON. My object is to prevent further debate.

Mr. DANIEL. As I made the motion to refer, I hope I may be allowed a word.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will withdraw my call for the previous question if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. DANIEL. I will, sir. I did not intend to commit myself against the bill by the motion

I made to refer, but I did think that in a case involving so large an amount of money the House should have the responsibility of a committee as to the facts. Gentlemen think they know something about the facts, but they may be mistaken. One of my objects was to have all the facts relative to the bill placed before the House. If those stated here should be ascertained to be true by a committee, I would not oppose the bill; on the contrary, I would willingly vote for it. Therefore it is that I cannot withdraw my motion. In accordance with the promise I made the gentleman from Alabama, I will call for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put. The question was taken upon the motion to refer, and it was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time?

Mr. MEADE. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union?

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote! Let the bill be put upon its passage!

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, objection having been made to the engrossment of the bill, under the rules, it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MEADE. My object in rising just now, was to enter a protest against hasty legislation in matters of this sort.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks debate is out of order.

Mr. MEADE. The testimony around me is so great in favor of the equity of this claim, that I will not make the motion I had intended. I am willing that the bill shall be passed.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Knowing as little as we do about that bill, I am not willing that it shall be passed, and object to its being engrossed.

Mr. MEADE. I ask the gentleman who has made the objection, to move it be the special order for some day.

Mr. STEPHENS. It cannot be done except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion, that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to by several members. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY ROOM.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, Senate bill No. 184, entitled "An act to provide for the repairing of the Congressional Library room lately destroyed by fire."

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the general consent of the House that that bill be put upon its passage. It is absolutely necessary that the committee should be authorized in some form or the other, at the present time, to issue their proposals.

Mr. ORR asked for the reading of the bill, and it was read.

Mr. ORR. I have heard enough of it to insist that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I hope this bill will not be committed.

Mr. ORR. It must go there when objection is made.

Mr. STANTON. I hope you will withdraw your objection.

Mr. ORR. I cannot.

Mr. STANTON. I will then state a few reasons why it ought not to go there, in the hope that it will induce members of the House to consent to take it up at an early day.

Mr. ORR. I rise to a question of order. I have objected to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion, that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that it be made the special order for Monday next.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object. I am opposed to all special orders. A majority of the committee can take it up whenever they wish without its being made a special order.

THE ADDITIONS TO THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following joint resolution from the Senate, No. 17.

"A resolution to authorize the continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol;" which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I make the same request of the House with reference to this resolution. I ask the unanimous consent that it be put upon its passage. It is exceedingly important that it should be done; because if this small appropriation is not speedily made, the work on the extension of the Capitol must, necessarily, remain in its present condition nearly the whole of the winter. The bill only proposes to appropriate $10,000 for the purpose of employing workmen to do that description of work which can be done during the winter, and to keep them employed until the regular appropriations shall be made. If the House will permit me, I will send to the Chair to be read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which shows the necessity of the appropriation.

Mr. ORR. My recollection is, that a committee of investigation was appointed a few days since, to inquire into the manner in which the work had been done upon these wings to the Capitol. There have been allegations made that the work is of such an insufficient and unsubstantial character, and composed of such material, that it may be necessary to take the whole of it down. I inquire of the chairman of that committee if he has made any progress in the investigation?

Mr. STANTON. The chairman [Mr. McNair] is not present, but I will take occasion to answer for him. That committee is now proceeding with the investigation. It will terminate, I have no doubt, in about two weeks. I will state, that no matter what may be the result of that investigation—whether they determine the foundations are strong enough or not—this appropriation will be expended in a way as not at all to be affected by it.

Mr. ORR. Not if the whole foundation is to be taken up?

Mr. STANTON. Not if the whole foundation has to be taken up.

Mr. ORR. How is it to be expended?

Mr. STANTON. In dressing stone which can be used in any other foundation, if it shall be decided to take down the present one. I have no idea, I do not believe any practical man in the city of Washington has any idea other than that the investigation will result in the declaration by the committee that the foundations are equal, if not superior, to any in the city of Washington.

Mr. ORR. The objection urged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who moved the appointment of this committee, was that the stone was of an unsubstantial character. I therefore think it proper that the consideration of this resolution should be postponed until we have the report of that committee.

Mr. McNAIR. The committee have appointed Professor Johnson to examine the stone, and have directed him to report to them its strength, its capability of sustaining the superstructure, and its power to resist the influence of the atmosphere. He says that he will report in about two or three weeks. The committee are still progressing with the testimony, which will in a short time be completed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to arrest this discussion if I can do so.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. HOUSTON. We can discuss all of these subjects legitimately upon the report of the committee.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the gentleman withdraw his objection for a moment, that the chairman of the committee may proceed to inform the House how far the investigation has progressed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will for a moment.

Mr. McNAIR. We have proceeded in the investigation by examining some five or six witnesses. The testimony is various. We will meet again on this day week, to examine the subject still further. We are still in doubt about the matter.

Mr. ORR. How long before the committee will be likely to submit a report?

Mr. McNAIR. It will be, I suppose, about four weeks, if Mr. Johnson reports previous to that time, which I suppose he will do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman that this bill containing an approprition, must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, if objection be made, which the Chair understands has been already done in this case.

The question was then taken, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

COLONEL MITCHELL.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do not propose to discuss or consider it, but let it remain, that the committee may take it up at some other time.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following bills from the Senate, which were severally read the first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

No. 25. An act supplementary to the several acts of Congress providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

No. 202. An act authorizing new registers to the American-built ship Obed Mitchell. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

No. 209. An act to change the time of holding the United States district courts in Alabama, and for other purposes. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLICATION OF THE LAWS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The next bill in order is a bill of the House to regulate the publication of the laws of the United States and public advertisements, which was reported from the Judiciary Committee, with a recommendation that it do not pass; and the question pending is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to lay the bill upon the table, and upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SMART. I wish to ask my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] if he will not have the goodness to withdraw his motion? I have some facts in relation to the cost of publication of the laws, which I desire to present.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us go into Committee of the Whole, by unanimous consent, and finish up the bounty land bill, or the bill referred a few minutes since in regard to Colonel Mitchell. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMART. I hope the House will not do that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] will renew the motion to lay upon the table, I will withdraw it.

Mr. SMART. It will be recollected by the House that I presented some views in relation to this subject a few days ago. The subject came up unexpectedly, and I had not prepared myself with such facts as I deemed necessary for the information of the House, and which I wish to present now briefly, for the benefit of those who may not have understood the character of this bill. I desire, in the first place, to state what the character of the bill is: It provides for the publication of the laws of the United States in two papers having the largest circulation in each Congressional district; and also provides that the public advertisements, whenever it may be necessary to publish them in any Congressional district, shall be published in the same papers. That is the proposition, and the objection to it seemed to be the expense. That was the great objection urged upon the House, and in relation to that I have something to say. I desire the attention of the House to the facts which I shall present. I do not now address myself to the country, but to the House. I will show what will be the expense under this plan of publication. Counted together, the Congressional districts and Territories amount to two hundred and thirty-eight. Two newspapers in each district and Territory will amount to four hundred and seventy-six. Add four papers in this District, and you make the total amount four hundred and eighty. I have a letter from the Department of State, showing the expense of publishing the Laws for the Thirty-first Congress, which I will read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, 9th July, 1851.

Sir: I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th ultimo, addressed to the Secretary of State; and in reply to the inquiries therein contained, to inform you that $224 was allowed to the publishers of each newspaper for publishing the laws, &c., of the first session, and $93 the second session of the Thirty-first Congress. No compensation is allowed to the publishers.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ZANTZINGER, Agent.

The average annual amount of cost, therefore, would be $158 50 to each paper.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will ask the gentleman from Maine, is that a letter from the State Department?

Mr. SMART. It is a letter from the State Department.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is evidently an error in the statement. I do not say the gentleman has committed it, but there is error somewhere, for I know the expense is greater than that.

Mr. SMART. I will say that the gentleman is wholly mistaken. The statement of the Secretary of State is correct, for I found the expense in the Blue Book.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not deny that the extract is a correct one.

Mr. SMART. I will state that I looked into the Blue Book, and I found the expense put down the same there as I have stated. Then I say that the whole expense of publication upon this basis, under this bill, would be $76,080, and no more. This would be the whole expense of the publication of the laws in the newspapers under this plan. And now when we are called upon to enact this bill, gentlemen rise up here and complain of the expense. They talk of the great expenditures of Government which will be involved in the publication of these Laws! But, sir, Congress expends a vast deal more money in many other respects. What is the expenditure for the benefit of individuals? This House appropriates annually, for books which go to its members—to the use of the legal profession and officers in this country, a sum exceeding $100,000. So much for expenditures for the benefit of individuals. Now, when you come to the expenditure of merely $76,000 for disseminating information of the most important character among all classes of the people, it is thought to be a very extraordinary proceeding. I have some facts showing the kind of distribution which is made of the laws of the United States.

Mr. CARTTER. What is the aggregate amount of the expenses of publication, as made by your investigation?

Mr. SMART. Seventy-six thousand dollars. I wish to call the attention of the House to the distribution of the Laws of the United States, handsomely bound, under the law of 1846. I mean Little and Brown's edition. They were distributed as follows: First, to the President and Vice-President; second, to the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States; third, to the Heads of Departments; fourth, to the Attorney General of the United States; fifth, to Foreign Governments; sixth, to the library of Congress; seventh, to the Law Library; eighth, to Committees of Congress; ninth, to District Judges and Clerks; tenth, to Judges and Clerks of Territories; eleventh, to Collectors of Customs; twelfth, to Surveyors of Customs; thirteenth, to Land Officers; fourteenth, to Foreign Ministers; fifteenth, to Navy-Yards, Naval Schools, and West Point Academy.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Do these books become the property of the individuals?

Mr. SMART. I was about to say, if the gentleman had not interrupted me, that these Laws handsomely bound, are distributed to these individuals for their use, while in office, under a law of the United States. And I will add, that they are better able to purchase them than thousands of the people of this country, who hold no office. While you have made this distribution of the Laws in handsome volumes to these officials, will you refuse to send the Laws of the United States, in some proper form, to the people? That is the question I put to the House. Gentlemen seem to think that no publication of the Laws in the public press is necessary. Do they go for placing the Laws only upon the shelves of the profession and the desks of politicians and office holders?

But there is another fact to which I wish to call the attention of the House. How much money, do gentlemen suppose, is expended here upon the printers of this city? Why you expend, on an average, $200,000 annually upon the printers and publishers of this city, exclusive of the amount paid to them for the publication of the laws and public advertisements. And yet, when I propose to expend $76,000 among the printers of the whole country—to the most healthy portion of the American press, and for the benefit of the whole people, gentlemen seem to think that it is an exorbitant expenditure. I hold that an expenditure which is for the benefit of the people, is a wise and good expenditure. I hold that the intelligence of the people is the solid basis of the republican institutions of this country, and that any expenditure which is made to disseminate information and light among the people, is a wholesome and proper expenditure. Show the people your laws and they will see where to apply the knife of retrenchment—they will make good use of the information you give them. The bill before us, I admit, adds a little to the expense of Government, but it will, in the end, lead to retrenchment.

But further: the present publication of the Laws of the United States is absurd—totally absurd. What is it? You provide for the publication of the Laws of the United States in two newspapers in each State—in two papers in the great State of Ohio, for instance, and in two papers in the State of Delaware. You not only make an arbitrary provision for the equal circulation of the Laws in States with populations greatly varying in amount, but you do more—you confine it to a party. When the Whigs are in power you give the circulation entirely to the Whigs, and when any other party is in power, you give it entirely to that party. I say, then, that the circulation of the Laws of the United States, as at present provided, is totally absurd. Why, what is the circulation of the laws of the State of Ohio, in that State? I have some information on that subject, which I suppose is nearly correct, for I obtained it from a gentleman belonging to Ohio. I understand that Ohio publishes her own Laws in two papers in each county. I understand further, that there are some eighty counties in the State, and that the Laws are published in something like one hundred and fifty papers in the State of Ohio alone, at an expense of about $12,000. That is what Ohio does; and if you take her circulation of the Laws as an average, it would cost $125,000 to publish the Laws of the several States of the Union. The States feel it important that their laws should be published; and Ohio and other States can afford as much as I have stated to publish their Laws, I think the Government of the United States might afford to pay $76,000 for the publication of the Laws of Congress for the benefit of the people.

Sir, is it a fact that the laws we make here are of no importance? We come here and sit in grave council; gentlemen come together from all parts of the country to legislate for the good of the country, and then publish the laws they enact in so few papers in the Union as to be almost inaccessible to the people. In my remarks upon this bill some days ago, I spoke of the patronage of Government dispensed to the press and to individuals, and I intend to say something more upon that subject now. I wish gentlemen to understand that there is a wide difference between the patronage of the Government and the expenditures of the Government. The Government may make expenditures and still give no patronage. This bill, it is true, slightly increases the expenses of the Government, but it diminishes its patronage. What I wish to speak of now, is the patronage of the Government—that is, the expenditures upon individuals over whose tenure of office the Administration have control. The patronage of this Government, it is well known, has become enormous, and I have some facts in relation to that subject to which I wish to call the attention of the House.

The expenditures of the Government, nearly all of which are under the control of the Administration, have been for certain periods as follows: In 1830, $13,229,533; 1840, $22,389,356; 1852, $43,816,124; exclusive of payment of the public debt; showing that the expenditures of the Government have nearly doubled in every ten years since 1830. I ask if this is not an enormous expenditure, and if we have not reason to be alarmed at the increasing patronage of the Government? In addition to this, you have under the control of the Administration a large portion of the press of the country, by means of the publication of the laws, and more particularly of the public advertisements.

Let us for a moment look at a few items of expenditure over which the President has a direct or indirect control, I read from Mr. Corwin's report:

Executive Department	$1,120,663 02
Governments of Territories	51,408 10
Surveyors and other clerks	60,680 57
Officers of Mint and branches	43,300 00

It is proper to state, that part of the amount allowed for governments of Territories goes to members of the Legislature of Territories, over whose tenure of office the President has no control.

I find that there are upwards of one hundred collection districts in the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury tells us in his annual report that he will need $2,450,000 to pay the salaries and other expenses incident to these collection districts. Take this branch of the service alone, and I ask this House if it does not present a case of enormous patronage of the Government? In the cities and towns where this immense sum is expended by the appointees of the President, the publishers of leading newspapers are the recipients of favor from the President, and willingly do his bidding.

By such instruments, influence is made in the great cities of the Union to control the Union. This influence exhibits itself in the shape of meetings, resolves, speeches, &c., and is often called public sentiment, when in truth it proceeds from the dictation of the Executive, and is merely the emanation of his will. It is true that when the people are in a state of healthy excitement they do their own work, and salaried men are compelled to stand out of their way. But in times of apathy there is always danger from the machinations of the hundred thousand men who are fed from the Treasury of the nation. There are, it is true, many honorable exceptions among the men holding office; but the great majority of those who receive office from the hands of the Executive respond with alacrity to his commands. These references to the patronage of the Executive are sufficient, I trust, to satisfy all of its magnitude—to satisfy all that it has increased beyond the increase of population—to satisfy all that it is liable to become a dangerous power unless its control is to some extent modified. Shall we, then, allow the Executive any longer the power to withhold or bestow patronage, so far as the press is concerned, or shall we pass this bill, which employs printers to do the work of the Government without the intervention of the Executive?

Why, sir, when I reflect upon this subject of Executive patronage, I am reminded of what was said in the time of the Revolution, by our fathers, against the mother country, and I have here one or two extracts, which, with the indulgence of the House, I will read.

Our revolutionary fathers fought for the correction of more abuses than it will be necessary for me to mention upon the present occasion. They fought to deliver themselves from unjust taxation, to preserve the principles of habeas corpus, and jury trials from outrageous violation by the British authorities, and to reform abuses in the distribution of offices and emoluments.

These abuses were made the subject of frequent complaint to the British Parliament, and to the people of England, and the American colonies. In an address (October 21, 1774) to the people of Great Britain, from the delegates in General Congress, at Philadelphia, the following language was used:

"We might tell of dissolute, weak, and wicked governors having been set over us, * * * of needy and ignorant dependents on great men advanced to the seats of justice, and to other places of trust and importance."

"Expensive and oppressive offices have been multiplied."—Memorial of Continental Congress, 1774.

"Judges of courts of common law have been made dependent on the Crown for their commissions and salaries."

Id. "The charges of usual offices have been greatly increased, and new, expensive, and oppressive offices have been multiplied."—Address to the King by Continental Congress, 1774.

"Officers employed in the administration of justice, have been rendered independent of the people with respect both to their salaries and the tenure of their commissions."—Address to the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, of Great Britain, by the New York Assembly, 1775.

"He [the British King] has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance."—Declaration of Independence.

I repeat, sir, when I reflect upon the enormous increase of the patronage of this Government, the multiplication of officers, and the control of the Government over those officers, I am forcibly reminded of the complaints of our fathers in the Revolution. I appeal to gentlemen to say if the patronage of the Government is not sufficiently large without giving to the Administration, to a great extent, the control of a thousand publishers and printers? And while I am upon this subject, I cannot perhaps do better than to call the attention of the House to a report made in 1826 by Mr. Benton, as chairman of a select committee of the Senate, recommending a reduction of the patronage of the Executive Government, and presenting among other bills to promote that object, one taking the control of the press away from the Executive. ask attention to one or two extracts from that report.

Speaking of the power and workings of the Federal patronage, he says:

"The whole of this great power will center in the President. The King of England is the 'fountain of honor,' the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of Federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has 'power' over the 'support' of the individuals who administer his system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and upon all the principles of human action, will dismiss them as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit will animate their actions in all the elections to State or Federal offices. There may be exceptions, but the truth of a general rule is proved by an exception."

"The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional or statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to rule as easily, and much more securely, with than without the nominal check of the Senate. * * * We must look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled, when the civil and military officers of the Federal Government will be quadrupled; when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent; when the nomination by the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public men will be open and avowed: The President wants my vote, and I want his patronage. I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? And what is the government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing. The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name soon accommodates itself to the substance. The first Roman Emperor was styled Emperor of the Republic, and the last French Emperor took the same title, and their respective countries were just as essentially monarchical before as after the assumption of these titles. It cannot be denied or dissembled but that this Federal Government gravitates to the same point. * * *

"In the country for which the committee act, the Press with some exceptions, the Post Office, the Armed Force, and the Appointing Power are in the hands of the President, and the President himself is not in the hands of the people. The President may, and in the current of human affairs, will be against the people; and in his hands the arbiters of human fate must be against them also."

"This will not do. The possibility of it must be avoided. The safety of the people is the 'supreme law,' and to insure that safety these arbiters of human fate, must change position, and take part on the side of the people."

"The committee must take things as they are. Not being able to lay the axe at the root of the tree, they must go to pruning among the limbs and branches. Not being able to reform the Constitution, in the election of President, they must go to work upon his powers, and trim down these by statutory enactments, wherever it can be done by law, and with a just regard to the proper efficiency of the Government. For this purpose, they have reported the six bills enumerated. They do not pretend to have exhausted the subject; but only to have seized a few of its prominent points. They have only touched in four places the vast and pervading system of federal Executive patronage—the Press, the Post Office, the Armed Force, and the Appointing Power. They are few compared to the whole number of points which the system presents; but they are points vital to the liberties of the country. THE PRESS IS PUT FOREMOST, BECAUSE IT IS THE MOVING POWER OF HUMAN ACtions; the Post Office is the handmaid of the Press; the Armed Force its Executor; and the Appointing Power the directress of the whole.

Let me say with regard to this bill that I have no pride of opinion about it, but I believe that it has merit, and I ask this House to consider it for its intrinsic merit. I want no triumph for the proposition because I have introduced it, but I ask gentlemen to look at the proposition; examine it carefully, and before they dispose of it by laying it on the table, to see if it is not worthy of consideration.

It has been proposed, as a means of reducing Executive power, to elect officers of the Federal Government by the people—to prohibit the appointment of members of Congress to office during their term of office; but these things can only be accomplished by an alteration of the Constitution, but a divorce of the press from the Government can be brought about at the present time by law. This bill will effect the object, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. CARTTER, (Mr. SMART yielding the floor.) With the permission of the gentleman from Maine, I will say that I am in favor of this bill, from a consideration that he has not alluded to, but I do not wish to detain the House with an argument upon the subject at this late hour of their session. The project contained in this proposition, is the first practical project for giving the freemen of the Republic a practical knowledge of what transpires here, in the way of law-making. The previous action of the Government upon this subject has acknowledged the duty, by some ways and means, of bringing the law-making power home to the knowledge of the makers of law-makers, and of giving evidence to the people of what transpires here, in the form of authoritative laws. Now, as has been justly remarked by the gentleman from Maine, it is a mockery of that design to commit the publication of our laws to two partisan presses in a State. It is a mere acknowledgment of the duty on the part of the Government towards citizens, to bring home to the citizens a knowledge of the laws that are enacted, without doing it. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine, is a practical proposition to make the people of the United States acquainted with the transactions of this body, when those transactions have assumed the solemn form of laws. I am in favor of it, for the reason that the history of this Republic and the history of the States within the Republic in their own municipal legislation, is this, that in proportion as you have brought the law-making agents into intelligible connection with the constituents of those agents, you have elevated the tone of legislation, and increased the responsibility of the Representatives. I am in favor of it, because it affords a record—an intelligible record that is read by every constituent who is worthy of wielding a vote, by which he can judge and bring to accountability the man who represents him.

Now, if you will confer upon your constituents a knowledge of your transactions, let them have it practically, instead of concealing them in the columns of a partisan press. There was an old law in Rome which compelled the authorities to publish upon the posts in the city of Rome what they had enacted into law. But it is said that in order to get rid of the effect of that law, the authorities caused their laws to be posted so high that the people could not read what they had enacted. So in regard to the laws which you enact here, you post them so high that the people cannot read them. You have been careful to transfer them to the columns of two partisan presses in each State, and you might as well have buried them below the soil of that State as to have done it. I hope this proposition will prevail. But the question of expense is mooted in it, and the subject of expenditure takes hold of the intelligence of the people. Now, when the question of expenditure is mooted in the publication of these laws, as a representative of the people, I have no fear of it. If this argument was urged in reference to the idle drafts upon the Treasury, proceeding from men who have no other interest than the consumption of money, I would go with the closest economist in relation to it. But here, it seems, the expenditure of $75,000 is grudging. Those who acknowledge the necessity for the publication of the laws grudge it. But when that $75,000 is sent on the mission of informing every reading citizen of the Republic of what you do, when what you do is resolved into the solemn form of law, the expenditure has no terrors for me.

I would advise your Committee of Ways and Means, when they come to consider the subject of retrenchment, to turn their attention to the idle Navy, rotting at your yards, and absorbing annually millions of the people's substance. Then give your attention to your corrupt contract system, which is eating out your Treasury by millions, instead of quibbling about this $75,000, by which it is proposed to acquaint the people with what we do. I hope the motion to lay this bill upon the table will not prevail, and that this House will do itself the justice to send home, if nothing else, a faithful daguerreotype of its proceedings.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Will the gentleman yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. SMART. I wish to conclude what I have to say.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I only want to make a suggestion. I hope the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be discussed. It comes before this House with a report of one of the standing committees against it, and it can hardly be expected that this House will at once pass the bill, when after being investigated by one of its intelligent committees it has been reported back with an adverse report. For myself, I am not prepared to say what are the merits of the bill. I desire to see it discussed and explained further before I am prepared to vote in its favor. But I hope it will go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I shall vote to give it that direction or I shall vote to lay it on the table. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. SMART,) that if he wishes to modify the existing law in this respect, that he allow it to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where there is already a bill pending in relation to the public printing. I have not the floor for the purpose of making that motion, and therefore can only suggest it. I should be glad to see these two bills considered together.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Maine yield in order to allow me to move an adjournment?

Mr. SMART. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw that motion. I desire to say a few words upon the bill, and it is not likely that it will come up again soon.

Mr. STEPHENS refused to withdraw the motion, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 13, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

POSTPONEMENT OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. GWIN. I move that the consideration of private bills be postponed for one hour, in order that memorials may be presented, and the usual business of the morning hour transacted.

Mr. CASS. Say till one o'clock.

Mr. CLARKE. What reason does the Senator from California assign for making this motion? We have since the adoption of the resolution setting Fridays apart for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, adhered to it thus far; and I would like to have a good reason why we should depart from it.

Mr. GWIN. I have already stated the reason, namely, that we might attend to our usual morning business. I only move to postpone the consideration of private bills for an hour.

Mr. CLARKE. Then I will move to amend the proposition of the Senator from California, by saying "till one o'clock." It is now half past twelve, and I think half an hour will be sufficient for all the morning business likely to come up today.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first on the longest time.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone for an hour, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to postpone until one o'clock, and it was adopted.

PETITIONS.

Mr. RUSK presented the petition of George W. Sevier, praying payment for hogs taken and used by the United States troops during the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CASS presented the memorial of Theophilus Hardenbrook, representing that he was taken prisoner during the last war with Great Britain, and confined more than two years in Dartmoor Prison, and praying a pension or some other remuneration for his sufferings and privations during that time; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CHASE presented two memorials of assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in Brown and Sandusky counties, Ohio, praying additional compensation; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of William Dusenbury, praying bounty land, be discharged from the consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

CHARLES A. GRIGNON.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report a bill for the relief of Charles A. Grignon, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of it now. It proposes to make an appropriation of only three hundred dollars for services rendered many years ago.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to pay to said Grignon such sum of money, not exceeding three hundred dollars, as he may be entitled to for extra services rendered as interpreter in the year 1848, in the negotiation of a treaty between the United States and the Menomonee tribe of Indians.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NAVY-YARD AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to appeal to the Senate to take up the bill to establish a navy-yard and dépôt on the bay of San Francisco, in California. That bill was up some time ago, and postponed at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROADHEAD] and the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER], both of whom are present. The passage of this bill is a matter of considerable importance to that section of the Union, and I hope it will be taken up and acted upon to-day. I am sure it will not occupy more than twenty minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. This bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with two additional sections as an amendment. To this amendment an amendment was offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER.] The amendments will be read.

The amendment submitted by Mr. BADGER was read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "operate," in the eleventh line of the third section, and insert the following words:

"The Secretary of the Navy be and he is hereby authorized and directed to enter into a contract with the patentees for the construction of a basin and railway, in the most approved form, connected with the said navy-yard and dépôt, substantially upon the agreement made with them under the act of September 20th, 1850, as stated in his report to the House of Representatives, dated January 20th, 1851: Provided, That the said contractor shall procure in California all the materials for said work that can be obtained and prepared there at an expense not exceeding the cost of procuring, preparing, and transporting them from the Atlantic seaboard to California."

Also, by striking out in the eighth and ninth lines in the amendment the words "President of the United States," and inserting "Secretary of the Navy."

[The object of this amendment is merely to transfer to the Secretary of the Navy the performance of duties proposed to be imposed by the reported amendment upon the President of the United States.]

Also, by inserting in section fourth of the amendment, at the fourth line, between the words "present" and "pay" the words "sea service."

[The object of this amendment is to designate the amount of pay to be given to the officers whom the Secretary of the Navy may appoint to select the site and perform the other duties mentioned in the first section of the bill, and to limit it in such manner that it shall not exceed double the amount of their present sea service pay.]

Also, to amend by adding the following section:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of enabling the President of the United States to carry into effect the provisions of this act, the sum of five hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BROADHEAD. This, Mr. President, is a very important bill. It provides for the establishment of a navy-yard, dépôt, marine barracks, naval hospital, and basin, and railway in connection with a dry-dock, which was ordered at the last session of Congress for California. I suppose, if this bill be passed, it will involve the necessity of an expenditure of from three to seven millions of dollars; I think, therefore, that it ought to be carefully examined. There are many provisions in this bill, which do not commend themselves to my favorable consideration, and I would like to have some little explanation from the honorable Senator from California with regard to them. I would like to know what necessity there is for marine barracks in California, or why we should order, by an act of Congress, a board of officers. Has not the Secretary of the Navy the power now to appoint such a board? I would like to know furthermore—and that is the important point of inquiry—what necessity there is for a railway and basin connected with the dry-dock in California. A railway and basin will cost a million and a half, and perhaps two millions of dollars, and require from five to ten years for its construction. I repeat, sir, that I would like to hear from the Senator from California what reason can he give for the marine barracks, and basin and railway, which he proposes, by this amendment, to have constructed in California in connection with a dry-dock. This matter was disposed of, I think, at the last session.

Mr. GWIN. It is not my purpose to make a speech on this question at all. This bill was unanimously ordered to be reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and accompanying the bill is a report, the reading of which will answer all the inquiries of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I ask that the report may be read.

The PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The committee review the policy of the Government in establishing permanent navy-yards for the construction and repair of vessels of war. It appears that the first attempt under our present form of Government to commence a naval establishment, was demanded by the necessity of defending our commerce and citizens from the piratical depredations of the Algerine corsairs. That, consequently, in 1794 an act was passed authorizing the building and equipment of six frigates, and that the building of the ships was directed in several ports of the Union, in order as well to distribute the advantages arising from the operation, as to ascertain at what places they could be built to the greatest advantage. That, in the commencement of our naval establishment, the public vessels of the Government were built in private dock-yards; but this experiment proving ineffectual—none of the vessels having been completed—a committee of the House of Representatives, in the year 1797, recommended the appropriation of a sum of money for the purpose of purchasing and fitting up a naval yard. That another committee of the same House, in the following year, had taken the same view of the matter, and that James McHenry, then Secretary of War, in a letter to the House, remarked, that the great delay that had occurred in the above-mentioned undertaking, must always be more or less experienced when heavy ships of war are required to be suddenly built, and the Government is not previously possessed of the necessary timber and materials. That it was certainly an unfit time to look for these and prepare a navy-yard, when the ships were required for actual service. It was not to be expected, that the large pieces of heavy timber suitable for ships of war would be found in market, or accumulated in private magazines for sale when wanted on pressing occasions. That, in a State paper from Benjamin Stoddard, the first Secretary of the Navy, dated April 25, 1800, he had stated his opinion, that the proper course to be pursued was to make the building-yards public property, and to commence them on a scale as if they were meant to be permanent.

The report proceeds to give the opinions of other gentlemen connected with the Government, declaring that docks for the repairing of ships ought to be convenient to the sea, and yet not easily accessible to an enemy. That yards for the building of ships, where large quantities of materials would be deposited, (the destruction of which would always be an object with an enemy,) should be in the vicinity of a commercial city for the convenience of procuring able workmen. It then states, that the opinions of public officers of high reputation, in the infancy of our naval establishment, have been verified by the experience of the last fifty years, and that they had been referred to because of their coincidence of the Senate committee as to the advantage of establishing at once a permanent navy-yard and dépôt on the bay of San Francisco, rather than to depend upon private establishments for the repairs or building of public vessels in that bay. That, being well satisfied of the necessity of having a naval establishment in that distant harbor, the only question was, whether such an establishment should be of a permanent or temporary character; and that the authority referred to, together with the settled policy of the Government, were considered conclusive upon that point.

In regard to the vessels of the Navy cruising upon that distant coast, none so well remembered, or felt more sensibly, the want of a port of safety in that region, than our naval officers who had served for many years past upon the voyages and cruises in the Pacific, both as to the repairing of their vessels and the recruiting of the health of their crews; and that, with a navy-yard as proposed, these great inconveniences to vessels making the voyage round Cape Horn and along the western coast of this continent would be in a great measure obviated. But that more especially was such an establishment needed on the western coast in case of war with a maritime nation.

The report then states the advantages to be derived, in a commercial and fiscal point of view, from a navy-yard and dépôt at San Francisco, adding security to our commercial marine, and the numerous vessels engaged in the whale fisheries in the Pacific, and that the greatly increased revenues in these western ports would more than counterbalance, in a very short time, any expenditure which might be made by the Government for this purpose. That, in an extended maritime and national aspect, the creation of a strong naval establishment in the bay of San Francisco, is of great importance to this country. That, when the immense value of the whale fisheries and trade to the western coast of the two Americas, to China and other countries of Asia, and the islands of the Pacific and Indian oceans, and the daily increasing trade and commerce of California and Oregon, are all considered, it must be confessed that this Government is under the strongest obligations to lose no time in providing the most ample means for the future security of all these interests, which belong almost entirely to the Atlantic coast and the enterprising mariners from New England engaged in the whale fisheries.

The report then details a variety of statistics, showing the extent of commerce and navigation in past years from the Atlantic ports to California, and concludes by urging the necessity of the appointment of a board of officers to superintend the construction of the dock and basin and railway.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Mr. President, the reading of this report does not satisfy my mind that we should authorize the construction of a basin and railway, which will involve an expense of from a million to a million and a half of dollars. This basin and railway is proposed to be built, not only without, but in opposition to, the recommendation of the department. It is also in opposition to the decision of the last Congress. This is my first objection. My second objection is, that it is entirely unnecessary and useless. I shall occupy the time of the Senate but a little while, for I only have a few practical suggestions and remarks of a business character to make.

Mr. President, no Secretary of the Navy has ever recommended this basin and railway in connection with the dry-dock. I find that this subject was before the Senate at the last session, and an inquiry was addressed to the Secretary of the Navy upon the subject, as to whether it was necessary; and he gave an answer which I will read to the Senate:

"In reply to so much of the resolution as inquires whether, in the judgment of the head of this Department, a dock could not be constructed sufficient for all the purposes of the Navy at much less expense to the Government than the one contemplated by the act aforesaid," I have to state that, in my opinion, a sectional dock alone, without the addition of a basin and railway, but with a pier to secure it, would answer every demand of the Navy on the coast of California, for many years to come. Such a dock has recently raised the steam-ship "Ohio," belonging to Messrs. Law & Co., in the harbor of New York, which ship is over three hundred feet in length.

"The cost of the dock alone would certainly be much less than one half, and possibly not more than one third, of the amount proposed to be paid for the whole work as herein stated. The addition of the pier to secure it, and render it capable of use, would probably not exceed $50,000. These can be completed and ready for use in two years, at most, and may be in fifteen or twenty months; while the addition of the basin and railway will require from four to five years to complete them."

That is the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, given at the last session, when this subject was brought to the attention of the Senate. I find, also, in the naval appropriation bill, a decision on this point:

"For the floating dry dock in California, $150,000; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby required so to modify the contract, alleged to have been made on the 17th of January last, as to confine the sum to the construction of the floating dock alone, without a basin or railway; Provided, The contractors will agree to do the work at the estimates made by the Department in November and December last: And provided, The Secretary considers the estimates fair and reasonable; and so much of said law as authorizes the construction of a basin and railway is hereby repealed: Provided, That, before making any contract, the Secretary of the Navy shall give at least sixty days notice by advertisement in the usual way."

So, sir, this question with regard to a basin and railway was decided at the last session. Sir, what does the Secretary of the Navy say in his report to the present Congress upon this matter?

"Agreeably to the act of the last session of Congress, a modified contract was entered into with Messrs. Dankin & Moody, and Gilbert & Secor, for the construction of a floating sectional dock on the Bay of San Francisco, to be completed and delivered for the sum of $510,000. This work is understood to be in a course of speedy execution, the contract requiring its completion in two years from the month of May last. Its precise location cannot be determined until the selection of a site for a navy-yard on the waters of that bay, for which purpose a commission will be sent out early in the ensuing spring. It will be necessary to provide a pier or basin to render this dock capable of use. The location of the dock not yet being determined, THE DEPARTMENT POSTPONES THE QUESTION OF PREFERENCE BETWEEN THESE TWO STRUCTURES UNTIL THE REPORT OF THE PROPOSED BOARD SHALL BE RECEIVED AND FULL LOCAL INFORMATION OBTAINED."

Yet this bill, without this proposed local information, authorizes the construction of this basin and railway, and the location of this navy-yard and dépôt, with reference to its construction.

Mr. CLARKE. If the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania will give way, as the time for the consideration of private bills has arrived, I will move to postpone the further consideration of this subject.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania give way?

Mr. BRODHEAD. I would rather finish my remarks now, if such is the pleasure of the Senate. It is, however, immaterial to me.

Mr. DAVIS, (in his seat.) Let him go on.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Why, therefore, enter into these contracts—

Mr. SHIELDS. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will suggest that I fear this will occupy the whole day.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. BRODHEAD. There seems to be a desire to proceed to other business, and I—

Mr. SHIELDS. I am very anxious to hear the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania give this subject a full investigation at an early day, and if he will permit me, I will move its postponement for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor, and must not be interrupted.

Mr. COOPER. I hope my colleague will give way.

Mr. BRODHEAD. It is a matter of very great indifference to me, but perhaps what few remarks I have to make may as well be made now.

Why should Congress undertake to order this dry dock to be constructed, and by certain gentlemen who have a patent-right for it? We have a Secretary of the Navy; we have a Bureau of Docks and Yards; we have a Bureau of Construction and Repairs; we have all the material and personnel necessary; and yet, whenever a dry dock is required we must have a contractor to do it, while the pay of our own officers goes on. We have engineers, artisans, constructors, everything of this kind, and yet, sir, contractors must be employed. Why, one half of the time we do not find out what is necessary for the naval service, unless we are informed by gentlemen who desire contracts. I am opposed to all acts of Congress providing for making contracts. Why, sir, this contract system and these contractors have become a kind of fourth estate. We have now the three departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial; and I think we ought to have a fourth, and that is, the contract department.

Mr. President, I have stated that this basin and railway is wholly unnecessary and useless. We have now more docks than there is any necessity for. How many ships have we to be repaired at these docks—because it is well known that they are not constructed for building vessels, but only for their repair—they were originally authorized, in 1848, for the purpose of repairing ships of the line? We have eleven ships of the line, and during the last three years we have expended three millions of dollars for building these docks. Eleven ships of the line to be repaired, once in three years, and we have spent nearly a million of dollars at Kittery, in Maine, nearly a million at Philadelphia, and nearly a million more at Pensacola, for these dry docks, and now a million and a half more is asked for a basin and railway connected with a dry dock in California. It is unnecessary in California, because our vessels will be repaired upon the Atlantic coast. There are no materials, sir, for constructing dry docks or repairing vessels in California. They will all have to be taken from the Atlantic border. Besides, provisions and labor are three or four times as dear in California, and our vessels should therefore be repaired upon the Atlantic coast, and not upon the Pacific side.

Mr. President, I have some statistics upon the subject of these dry docks, by which I wish to show to the Senate how much we have paid for dry docks during the last three years, in fact since the organization of the Government. Up to about ten years ago, we had expended $1,652,446 47 for docks. We spent prior to the commencement of the stone dock at New York that amount. We then paid $2,146,255 36 for the stone dock at New York, making, together with what had been previously expended, $3,798,701 83. Thus it appears that previous to 1848 we had spent upwards of three millions of dollars, nearly four millions, for docks. Well, sir, in 1848 this new system commenced. Certain gentlemen had obtained a patent for the kind of dock mentioned in this bill, and we have paid them since that time, $3,078,594. So, sir, we have spent, and given to this particular set of contractors, for this particular kind of dock, in opposition to the decisions of the Navy Department, nearly as much money as has been spent from the time of the organization of the Government up to 1848. We have expended six millions since the commencement of the Government for docks, and of that sum over three millions have been given to these contractors, and that since 1848. These are statistics which are taken from the Navy Department, and I believe them to be correct, and they are unanswerable.

Mr. President, it is said that it is necessary to have this work for our protection in time of war. In time of war! What nation wants to go to war with us? We fought the battles of the Revolution with three millions of people; and we did very well during the war of 1812 with about ten millions, and without these dry docks, basins and railways. We are not about to become armed propagandists, saying to other people, "Come, and adopt our principles and institutions—come, be brethren of ours, or we will cut your throats!" I do not think that is any part of the policy of this Government. Our danger is not from without, but from within.

Mr. President, I have stated that these docks are not only unnecessary, but useless. We have a dry dock at Philadelphia. It was to be completed and tested with a ship of the line last June; and what does the Secretary of the Navy inform us? Why, in December he said they had a dredging machine for the purpose of preparing the dock to receive a ship of the line, in order to have it tested. And when it was taken off the hands of the contractors, notwithstanding the work was so obstructed by want of water, they said, "Give us the money, it is not for us to find water." They were right in what they said, and were not to blame. Now, what I want to know is, whether a dredging machine will not be constantly necessary there to make the dry dock of any use, and whether it will not be constantly filling up after it is dredged out.

I have stated, Mr. President, that more than three millions of dollars have been paid to these contractors for this particular kind of dock, and that, too, within the last three years—since 1848; and I will now give the items in detail. They received for building a dry dock, basin and railway at Kittery, in Maine, $732,915; for building a similar one at Philadelphia, $813,742; for building one at Pensacola, $921,937; and for a floating dry dock alone at San Francisco they are to receive $610,000, according to the report of the Secretary of the Navy at the present session.

Now, sir, it is said that this floating dry dock is useless without a connection with a basin and railway. I deny that statement. I say that basins and railways are entirely unnecessary in connection with a dry dock; and I am sustained in this position by the Secretary of the Navy. He says that a pier is all that is necessary; and that alone will cost only $50,000. A basin and railway will cost from a million to a million and a half.

But there is another fact which I wish to bring to the notice of the Senate, to sustain the position which I have assumed. This kind of dry dock has been in use and patented for ten years, and a basin and railway has never been connected with one for the merchant service. This is an unanswerable fact. Merchants never think of making use of the basin and railway. They use a pier, which costs $50,000, instead of a million or a million and a half. These, Mr. President, are the large objections which I have to connecting basins and railways with this dry dock authorized at the last session of Congress.

Another thing, Mr. President. This bill not only proposes that these officers should receive their regular pay, but that that pay shall be doubled, and their expenses paid also. Sir, if that is the way you are to pay the officers of the Navy, who receive their pay whether they are on duty or not, I shall be much mistaken. This bill also provides that we are to pay for the land and for the location the amount which may be awarded by a jury in California. A jury in California is to say not how much the State of California is to pay for the location, but how much the United States is to pay for it. I rather think, sir, that it will be a pretty large sum. It is true that the bill provides that the district attorney shall approve the award, and also that it shall be approved by the Attorney General of the United States. Sir, the district attorney lives in California, and the Attorney General of the United States lives here.

The bill also provides for a marine barracks. What necessity is there for a marine barracks in California? How many marines will you have to send there? Sir, we have only about nine or ten hundred marines—perhaps eleven hundred with the officers of a brigade—and we have already a marine barracks at Portsmouth, another at Boston, another at New York, another at Philadelphia, another at Washington, another at Norfolk, and another at Pensacola; and we are to have one more at San Francisco, although we have but eleven hundred marines, and more than three fourths of them are on board our national vessels. Sir, if this barracks is established at San Francisco, we will not have ten men to put into it. These, however, are objections of minor importance. My main objection is to the amendments proposed to this bill. I object especially to the provisions of the amendment authorizing the construction of a basin and railway in connection with a dry dock. We have expended money enough in constructing docks recently. I have some objection to the details of this bill. They are of minor consideration, it is true; but I will state them. I have already shown that the Secretary of the Navy has informed us that he has already the power to appoint this board of officers to make this location. A navy-yard may be necessary in California. I believe that it is; but we need not provide for the appointment of a board of officers. The Secretary of the Navy now has power to appoint them.

Mr. GWIN. I will not continue this debate now. I do not intend to intrude on the private business set apart for this day; but I give notice to the Senate, that if this bill goes over until Monday, I will then call it up, in order that I may have an opportunity of replying to the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania. If it is the wish of the Senate, I will proceed now; but I do not wish to intrude on this day, which has been set apart for private business. When I do speak, I pledge myself not to leave the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Brodhead,] for the argument brought forward this morning, and which has been so laboriously prepared, an inch of ground to stand on; or, if I do not do this, some other member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, much more able than myself to discharge the duty, will. The Senator's speech is a mere rehash of arguments which have been brought up time and again in opposition to this system, and discredited by both Houses of Congress. Why is it that the Secretary of the Navy should know more in regard to this question than the Congress of the United States, which has laboriously and thoroughly examined this question, and always overruled their views, which, in my opinion, are narrow and contracted in this respect, in regard to our progress in naval affairs? I am prepared to meet and overcome every argument which has been brought forward by the Senator from Pennsylvania; and if this pledge is not redeemed by myself or some other member of the committee, then I expect the bill to be defeated. I will not go into the argument to-day, but it is due to myself to say, that I am not in the habit, either as a member of this body or as the organ of one of its committees, of connecting my name with any measure which can be so easily overthrown. This bill has been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs unanimously; and I do not think that a single argument brought forward by the Senator from Pennsylvania is so unanswerable as he seems to think, and as he will find out before the bill is disposed of. Without giving up my right to the floor, I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I gave notice yesterday that I should to-day ask the Senate to take up the bill making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads. At the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, who is a friend of my bill, and at the suggestion of other friends, as well as in consequence of the general disposition of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of private bills, I will not make that motion; but I desire to give notice that I shall on Monday ask the Senate to take up that bill. I have been assured by gentlemen, friends and opponents of the measure, that when the Senate next takes up the bill, they will dispose of it.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. CHASE. A bill, at its third reading, in relation to notaries public, was yesterday, on my motion, postponed until to-day. I was then acting under the supposition that the bill required an amendment, for I thought it was the same bill which had been passed by the Senate two years ago; but I find, upon inquiry, that the amendment which was proposed last year by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] and then modified on my motion, has been substituted for the bill upon the motion of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I therefore ask that the bill may now be taken up and passed.

The bill was accordingly taken up and passed, and its title was amended so as to read:

"An act to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments, in certain cases."

ENUMERATION OF FIRE-ARMS.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War, made the 25th of February, 1851, exhibiting the number of fire-arms belonging to the United States, be printed.

CLAIM FOR THE OCCUPATION OF KEY WEST.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of John W. Simonton. It provides that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, audit and settle the claim of John W. Simonton and others, owners of the island of Key West, Florida, upon principles of justice and equity, on account of its occupancy by the Government of the United States as a naval and military post during the years 1823, 1824, 1825, and 1826; and that in settling it upon these principles they shall ascertain, as nearly as practicable, the benefits and advantages which accrued to the United States from the occupancy of it; and also the injuries which resulted to the owners of it; and to pay the same out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I feel myself compelled to oppose this bill. I object to it on account of its form, and also on the ground that the claim itself is utterly worthless, and forms no just demand against the United States. I shall endeavor to show satisfactory reasons for my opposition to this bill. I object to the form of this bill on this ground: Congress has uniformly adhered to the determination not to establish a board, or court of claims, or any tribunal for the purpose of deciding upon claims made against the United States. Yet this bill is intended to effect, in a particular case, what you have refused to pass as a general law. I can see no reason which shows this course to be necessary in this case. It is a case of contingent damages—damages exceedingly indefinite in the grounds on which they are claimed. And if it be true that you are unwilling to intrust a tribunal established for the purpose, where the power of the examination of witnesses, both on the part of the United States and on the part of the claimant, would exist, and where the power of cross-examination would exist—if you are unwilling to constitute such a tribunal, and such has been hitherto the determination of Congress—on what principle is it that you can sanction a bill which refers to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department the settlement of a claim for contingent damages, founded upon a very indistinct statement of the grounds upon which these damages are claimed? It seems to me that this is entirely inconsistent with the legislation of Congress on the general subject.

The bill proposes to refer to the accounting officers, under the opinion of the Attorney General, the settlement of the claim of Simonton and others, on principles of justice and equity. If there is no rule prescribed in the bill by which the judgment of these officers is to be governed, it becomes a question of arbitrary discretion on their part as to what amount of damages they will allow. This is an objection, and I think a sufficient objection, to the bill as it now stands. There are no adjudicated principles that I know of which can be applied to govern or control the accounting officers in the amount of the allowance they shall make under this bill.

But the bill goes further. It does profess to point out a rule for the ascertainment of damages, which is, in one branch of it, correct. The bill says that, in the settlement of this claim upon the principles of justice and equity, "they shall ascertain, as nearly as practicable, the benefits and advantages which accrued to the United States from the occupancy of it; and also the injury which resulted to the owners of it; and to pay the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." Is that a sound principle for the assessment of damages, taken altogether? I would ask the Senate, Was such a mode of the assessment of damages ever before heard of, as this first part of direction, that the accounting officers are to ascertain the amount of damages to these parties upon the principle of the advantage to the United States from the occupation of the island?

No such principle has ever obtained in reference to the United States, nor could it in justice obtain. The benefit of the United States is not a source of injury to the claimants. If the United States take the property of a citizen for any purpose whatever, though that purpose may prove fruitless, and though it may be a wasteful and extravagant expenditure on their part, they are bound to compensate him to the extent of his loss. But on what principle is it that, because it may become important to the United States to take possession of private property, the United States are to make compensation according to the benefit which they received, as well as according to the injury of the party? The value of the property, the real damage to the party, should be the sole measure of the injury in every case. Take a common illustration of this: In almost all the States there are internal improvements, railroads, which are made by railroad laws, for the incorporating of individuals in order to enable them to make railroads, and giving generally a power, where the parties are incompetent, from minority or any other cause, or are unwilling to agree as to the sale of their land, that the damages may be assessed by a jury. But do those laws contain a clause which authorizes a jury to ascertain the advantage which will flow to the company from the occupation of the land, as well as the damages which the party will sustain? Did any man ever hear of such a proposition as this, that the importance of land to the company which is to make the road was to be taken into the account in ascertaining the damages? Yet this is the principle upon which this bill goes. If it is recognized as a correct principle, wherever there is, on the line of a railroad, some portion of land absolutely necessary in order to lay out the road, the individual holding it will only have to say that it is absolutely essential to the company, they cannot get along without it, and therefore the measure of my damages must be the benefit to the company.

I submit that it is no true measure of damages recognizable on any principle either in the case of an individual or in the case of the Government. The bill, therefore, in point of form, in my judgment, enacts an unsound rule for ascertaining the damage sustained by the party, and that, being unsound in principle, it ought not to be retained in the bill. Secondly, I am opposed to the bill on the ground that it gives a discretionary power to ascertain damages under, as I have said, a false rule; but whether with or without the rule, that discretionary power ought not to be given. If we are to compensate these parties for the injuries they have sustained, let Congress do it; but as long as Congress refuse to establish a tribunal by which claims against the United States can be properly adjudicated, and settled upon some recognized and known principles, there can be no reason for making these the exceptional ones to the action of Congress in reference to a general principle. On either ground I am opposed to this bill in its present form; and unless it is put into a different shape, I shall oppose it on these grounds; but waiving these objections, I will now proceed to state my objections to the claim for relief on which the bill is founded.

I have had my attention called to the bill in consequence of the mode in which the damages were directed by it to be estimated, and I have taken the trouble to read over all the papers which are printed, with the report of the committee in the previous report of the committee of the House of Representatives. The conclusion that my judgment has come to from this examination is, that this is a speculative claim from the beginning to the end; that the parties who have prepared it (and they have prepared it well) have done it on a speculation upon the Government, and that there is no just claim against the United States for a single dollar. It appears that in 1821, Simonton, who resided in Havana, knowing (and I presume that he knew it, for the papers are very indefinite in their information on many points) that he could probably obtain an old Spanish grant in the hands of a man by the name of Salas, on the 7th of December, of that year, addressed a communication to the Government, (whether or not to the Naval Department does not appear,) calling their attention to the importance of Key West, then a desolate and uninhabited island, as a naval station. He did not do this as the owner—not as a claimant—not as a person having any individual interest, but with a view to the benefit of the country; and within thirty days after he had sent this notice to the Government, which they immediately acted upon by surveying it, he purchased it. This was at the time when there were a great many pirates in the neighborhood of the West Indies who preyed upon our commerce. Within thirty days after he had done this, he purchased from Salas, for two thousand dollars, his Spanish grant. The papers in the case show that there was a contest in reference to titles between the Governor, Gidney, of South Carolina, and Mr. Simonton. None of these titles had been acknowledged under the treaty of Florida—none of them had been produced. There was no law till 1832 to authorize any adjudication upon them. As to possession, the evidence is exceedingly imperfect. The United States in 1822 had a survey made of the island under Commodore Perry, and left there a guard with a view to the protection of the island, which was then, and had been hitherto, according to that officer, a resort for smugglers and pirates, and utterly unsafe as a residence. Being found to be admirable for the purposes indicated in this communication, the Government subsequently, in 1823, directed Commodore Porter to establish a naval depot and barracks there, when he was put in command of the squadron for the purpose of suppressing piracy in these seas. Under these orders he made the establishment, and he reported that he had so made it in April, 1823. Immediately there commenced a scene of constant disputes between the commanding officer and the alleged owners of the land, whose title had not yet been established, and was not established until 1825. These disputes were in reference to their rights in relation to a plan of the town, and in reference to the preparations alleged to have been made by them for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of salt. There were various other difficulties existing between them. They alleged that Commodore Porter exercised arbitrary power as to the disposition of their property; and on these grounds, which are very imperfectly proved, and by entirely ex parte testimony, they now come forward to claim, at the hands of the Government, contingent damages arising out of the acts of Commodore Porter. They say that he destroyed their wood, and they had to abandon certain hogs on the island; that he interfered, by his despotic orders, with their commercial enterprises; that he prevented settlers from coming on the island; that the establishment of martial law by him on the island was an interference with their rights of property, as he refused that any person should build without his authority or permission; that it not only broke up their commercial arrangements, but that it tended to prevent the settlement of the island, retarded its commercial interests, and deteriorated its value. This is the general ground of complaint which is made.

Now, in point of fact, it appears that for this island they gave $2,000; and they received from the Government $4,000 for the site of a custom-house, $3,200 for ground for the barracks, and $6,800 for other land purchased from them by the Government, making $14,000 paid for property on the island for the use of the Government. They were also paid in 1847 by the Navy Department, for the wood which they alleged was used by the Navy, $3,695. Thus they received altogether from the Government $17,695 and some cents, for an island which cost them but $2,000. The real damage, in my judgment, was fully paid for when the wood was paid for. That is the inference which I derive from the proof in the case.

The learned Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLOY,] who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by whom this bill was reported, well understands that damages at law, even between individuals, may be too remote to be recovered. A great portion of the damages claimed in this case are objectionable on that ground. The allegation that these parties intended and had made preparation to establish salt-works there, which were interfered with by the officers of the Government, is not proved in itself; and if it were proved it comes under that class of damages too remote, even in the case of individuals arising out of the trespass, to justify the recovery of damages. But there is another ground which, in my judgment, cuts off this claim altogether. The Secretary of the Navy, in February, 1823, instructed Commodore Porter to take possession of the island. An extract from the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy is to be found at page 20 of the report made to the House of Representatives in 1848, and it is attached to the report of the Senate committee. This extract contains all of Commodore Porter's instructions in relation to his duty in regard to this island:

"You will establish at Thompson's Island, usually called Key West, a depot, and land the ordnance and marines to protect the stores and provisions. If, however, you shall find any important objection to this place, and a more suitable and convenient one can be found, you are at liberty to select it as a depot."

These were the orders of the Government to the officer. If under these orders for establishing a depot, the officer, without warrant of law, chose to declare martial law—if he infringed on the rights of the citizens by any arbitrary conduct, the courts were open for relief, and the Government can incur no responsibility for the malversation of its officer or for his acts, beyond his orders and authority. I do not state this merely from my own opinion, but on the authority of a very able and distinguished man, formerly Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Legaré, in an opinion given by him on the case of Sibbald, somewhat similar to this, and which was referred to in the petition of the memorialists. A bill was passed referring, without any rule being laid down, to the accounting officers to settle the accounts of Sibbald for damages, which was a case not dissimilar, but in the particular facts of course not the same as this. Fortunately for the country, Mr. Legaré was Attorney General. He gave his opinion on the case, which will be found in the "Opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States," page 1543. He there lays down the rules which should guide the accounting officers in that case in ascertaining the damages. Among them he lays down this proposition, which I take to be unquestioned in law, and which cannot be contradicted here or elsewhere:

"The damages must not only have been directly caused, not merely occasioned, by the interference of any agent of the United States, but he must have acted under their authority. Whatever the agents did beyond their instructions, clearly they did in their own wrong, and the Government is not responsible."

I say, then, that, on the proofs in this case, there is not a single fact shown of any act done to the individual who makes the claim here, by Commodore Porter, which is within his instructions, for which the parties have not been paid. The depot has been paid for: the site for the barracks and the custom-house has been paid for. The wood alleged to have been taken has been paid for. And there is no other act within his instructions complained of, which is, as far as I have read these papers, attempted to be proved. It is alleged, that by his arbitrary conduct on the island—containing altogether about seven hundred acres—its value was greatly diminished. It is said that he ordered the proprietors to pen up their hogs; and that in consequence of their inability to do so they were obliged to abandon them. If he gave that order he did it without right. The right could not be derived from the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy. If it was done, it was a violation of the rights of property; and they were not bound by it. If the hogs had not been penned up and they were used by the Government, the Government would then be responsible. But there is no proof of that. There is no proof as to by whom the hogs were taken. They simply declare that they were abandoned in consequence of an order of Commodore Porter. If he made such an order, it was clearly illegal, and could not have been derived from his power to establish a depot. That power of his did not give him jurisdiction over the whole island.

Another ground of complaint is, that by the occupation of the island its settlement was retarded. Now, in my opinion, great advantages accrue to these parties from the occupation of the island by the Government. But those advantages seem to be altogether lost sight of. At the time the island was taken possession of by the Government, the report of Commodore Perry shows that it was a desolate island, the resort of smugglers and pirates, and unsafe as a residence. It will be found on page 16 of the report of 1848 of the committee of the House of Representatives, that Commander Perry, in a communication dated March 28, 1822, uses this language:

"Heretofore the Florida Keys have been the resort of smugglers, New Providence wreckers, and in fact of a set of desperadoes who have paid but little regard either to law or honesty. The present establishment, though on a small scale, will, I conjecture, (with the assistance of the settlers,) be enabled to keep these lawless people from this island. But I would suggest the necessity of an early augmentation of force, if it be only for the purpose of enforcing the revenue laws. A gun-boat would be a force sufficient to answer all the purposes required."

There are many other matters contained in the facts stated in this case which are open to comment; but it is not worth my while to detain the Senate by commenting upon them. The fact is certainly not proved in the cases that some of the parties who claimed damages had an interest in the property at the time. They claim that they had an interest; but their interest is not shown. There is also a disconnection in the proof as to many of the facts, which, if it were worth while, I would now comment upon. But I shall not trouble myself with those matters now.

I wish, however, to refer to a fact which appears to have escaped the notice of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this body, at this session. This claim was originally presented in the name of John Whitehead, who is now one of the claimants. But this is now here as the claim of John W. Simonton. It was before Congress as early as the first session of the Twenty-third Congress. The committee were then discharged from the consideration of the claim; and it was referred to the Secretary of the Navy. At the second session of the Twenty-third Congress, the Secretary of the Navy made a report upon it; and that report I ask to have read. It shows that this matter has been fully investigated, and that, too, at a time when there were better means of investigation—while Commodore Porter was living.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 15, 1834.

The Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with the directions contained in the resolution of the Senate of the United States, of the 16th June last, referring the memorial and documents of John Whitehead, and others, owners of Key West, for examination into the facts therein stated, to collect the necessary evidence, and report the same, together with copies of such letters and papers in this Department as relate thereto, to the Senate at its next session, has the honor to make the following report:

The parties interested in this case state, that, in consequence of a communication made by them on the 17th December, 1821, representing the peculiar importance of Key West, as a naval station to protect our commerce from pirates, and suppress the slave trade, Lieutenant Perry was ordered, on the 7th February, 1822, to examine said island and its harbors, &c., and, if deemed necessary by him, to take possession in the name of the United States; and that on the 28th March following, he made a report of his proceedings.

That instructions were subsequently issued to Captain Patterson, on the 15th November, 1822, who reported the result of his examinations on the 11th March and 10th July, 1823.

That Commodore Porter, on the 1st of February, 1823, received his general instructions, as commandant of the West India station, and was directed to establish a depot at Thompson's Island, usually called Key West, and land ordnance and marines to protect the stores and provisions.

That the said commander assumed entire control and jurisdiction of said island; forcibly appropriating wood already cut, and causing more to be cut down and used, seizing and using, for his officers and men, hogs and sheep running at large, the property of the memorialists; prohibiting the owners and their agents from building or improving without his permission; and enforced military law upon the said island; of which grievances, they state, that they informed the Navy Department by a communication dated the 1st of February, 1825.

In support of these allegations, the memorialists offer the deposition of Griffith W. Roberts; the copy of a letter from Commodore Porter to Lieutenant James M. McIntosh, sworn to by John Whitehead; a letter of Master Commandant M. P. Mix to said Whitehead; certified copies of two letters from P. C. Greene & Co. to Commodore Porter, and the original of Commodore Porter's reply; a certificate of Lieutenant James M. McIntosh, with copy of Commodore Porter's letter to him above referred to, and an imperfect copy of the communication of 1st February, 1825, which are all hereto annexed, lettered from A to G inclusive.

The records and files of the Navy Department have been carefully examined, but afford no information nor evidence of the seizures and damages which the memorialists complain that they sustained, nor can any communication be found to have been received from them on the subject, dated the 1st of February, 1825.

The communication of the 7th of December, 1821; the report of the Secretary of the Navy, of the 29th of December, 1822, to the President; and the instructions to Lieutenant Perry, Commodore Patterson, and Commodore Porter, and the reports by these officers, to which the memorialists allude, are appended hereto, and numbered from 1 to 8, inclusive. All which is respectfully submitted,

MAHLON DICKERSON.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senate will observe that the case was fully examined by the Secretary of the Navy at that time, and that the communication containing complaints against Commodore Porter's conduct, which it is alleged that these parties made in February, 1825, was never made. The Secretary states, that after an examination of the records, he could find no evidence of the seizures and damages of which the memorialists complain. He could not find the communication containing complaints against Commodore Porter, said to have been made in 1825; but a mutilated copy of the alleged communication was offered as evidence. This report was made to Congress after a full examination of all the facts and circumstances connected with the claim.

At the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress nothing was done in regard to this claim. Nothing was done at the second session of that Congress. At the second session of the Twenty-fifth Congress the committee were discharged from the consideration of the subject. At the first session of the Twenty-sixth Congress the committee made an adverse report upon the claim of the petitioner, after investigating all the facts. After the report was made, leave was granted to withdraw the papers of the party; and they now bring forward the same claim, and, as far as I can judge, precisely on the same papers, without any additional testimony whatever: at any rate, no additional testimony seems to have been taken since that time. That report was made to the Senate on the 23d of January, 1840. It is report No 109 of the first session of the 26th Congress.

Mr. TAPPAN submitted the following report:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of John Whitehead, for himself and others, with the accompanying documents, report:

"1st. That the memorialist avers that in December, 1821, he and his associates became the proprietors of the island of Key West, by purchase of a Spanish grant of the 6th of August, 1815; that in December, 1821, they took possession of the island, and held it to the time of filing the memorial.

"2d. That the memorialist represented to the Government of the United States the advantages of Key West as a naval station, and invited its use for that purpose; that in consequence of such invitation, the island was in March or July, 1823, taken possession of by Lieutenant Perry, acting under orders from the Secretary of the Navy; that such occupation of the whole of the island was continued until some time in 1827, and of part of it until the year 1831.

"3d. The memorialists complain that the naval officers interfered with their plans of building and arranging their towns lots, and built their store-houses without any regard to such lots; that they exercised exclusive authority over the island, in the name of the United States, and did not permit the memorialists to do in all things as they pleased.

"4th. That three hundred cords of cut and piled wood were taken and used by the officers of the Navy, and an unknown quantity of wood was cut and used by them.

"5th. That the memorialists owned a large stock of hogs and sheep, which ran at large on the island, which they were compelled wholly to abandon.

"6th. That the very large profits which might have accrued to them from the commerce of the place, were lost by the transformation of the port of entry into a military tribunal.

"The items of claim set up by the memorialists, are as follows, viz:

"1st. For the forcible occupation and use of Key West for a period of three and one half years.

"2d. For damages in consequence of their inability to induce the employment of capital there in salt-making.

"3d. For depreciation of the value of Key West to its proprietor, growing out of its use, by the United States.

"4th. For three hundred cords of wood forcibly taken.

"5th. For five hundred cords of wood forcibly cut and used.

"6th. For three hundred sheep.

"7th. For two hundred hogs.

"Florida was ceded to the United States in 1819, and possession was taken of the territory on the 10th of July, 1821; the memorialist says that he took possession of the island of Key West, in December, 1823. The principal part of the claim of the memorialist is bottomed upon the hypothesis that in December, 1823, he had a lawful right to take possession of the island without waiting to have his claim admitted and recognized by the Government of the United States, and that, of course, the interference by the officers of the Government with his possession was illegal. In both these positions the committee are of opinion that the memorialist is mistaken. The grants made by the Spanish Government of lands in Florida before the treaty of cession, unless the grantees were in actual possession at the time the territory was delivered to the United States, were not acknowledged as valid until they had been so recognized by the appropriate tribunal, and did not give any legal right to such grantee to place himself in possession.

"The memorialist produces no evidence of title to the island in question, but the committee have taken it for granted that his claim is as he states it, one not yet patented, and therefore not definitively acknowledged by the United States; and with this view of it, they are of opinion that the first three items in the specification of his claim cannot be allowed.

If the law did allow claimants under Spanish grants, standing in the situation of the memorialist, to take possession and survey out for themselves the territory granted, and so the memorialist had a right to take and hold exclusive possession of the island in 1823, it is admitted by the memorialist that it was made a naval station, and used by the naval department as such, at the pressing instance and request of the memorialist, and that the memorialist has been paid his own price for such grounds as were occupied for the public service; nor does it appear that the officers in command on that station interfered in any way with the occupancy and use of the residue of the island by the memorialist and his associates, or prevented them from using the natural advantages of the island in the manufacture of salt. There is, therefore, no equitable claim against the Government for those specifications.

As to the claim for the use of the memorialist's sheep, hogs, and firewood, the evidence adduced is extremely loose, indefinite and contradictory; but it is unnecessary for Congress to legislate upon this part of the claim, for if the memorialist has furnished these supplies for the Navy, upon application and due proof of the facts to the proper department, the existing laws authorize payment to be made for them.

Your committee, therefore, report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialist is unreasonable, and cannot be granted."

Unreasonable, indeed, the claim was then, and it is not less unreasonable now.

Mr. FISH. When was that report made?

Mr. BAYARD. In 1840, when all the facts which now appear in the papers were brought before the Senate, and were in existence and in the knowledge of the parties. I presume, therefore, that they were brought before the committee; but if they were withheld it was the fault of the claimants.

As I said before, there is no ground of claim for any damages arising out of any legal order. The wood which was taken has been paid for. The land which was occupied has been paid for. As to the occupation of the island under martial law, or as the place for the sitting of a military tribunal, if Commodore Porter did that, he went beyond the warrant which his orders allowed him to go; and if an officer transgresses the orders which are given him by the Department, and inflicts injury upon a citizen as regards his rights of property, he puts the Government under no responsibility, but is himself responsible. No order was given to him to establish there a military tribunal; no order was given to him to put the island under martial law; but simply to establish a depot and naval station there. That was all. And for the land which was taken to fulfill that order the claimant has been paid. If the opinion of Mr. Legare be correct—and I hold it clear that it is so—there can be no responsibility on the part of the Government to pay these individuals for any alleged acts of injury inflicted by the arbitrary orders of Commodore Porter.

For my own part, I give but little credence to the ex parte testimony now brought forward and promulgated, when Commodore Porter is not here to answer it, and when it is not corroborated by the reports he made to the Government in the course of his official duties as commander of the post. Therefore I cannot sanction such a claim by my judgment and my vote. For these reasons I am opposed to the claim altogether. I think it appears, on examination of the papers, that this is a speculative claim. The parties, having no interest in the island at all, invited the attention of the Government to it at a time when they were probably negotiating for its purchase. They asked the Government to establish a naval station there, so that the island might grow into importance. They then purchased an old Spanish claim for $2,000. The Government, after the recommendation was made by them, sent an officer there and established a depot. Thus these parties derived advantages from that. They were enabled to settle the island, which had before been a resort for smugglers and pirates. This they could not have done without the establishment of the depot by the Government. Having received all these advantages from the Government, they immediately began to quarrel with the officers as to all their acts. But now, conceding that some of these acts were arbitrary, we do not know the exigencies of the case. We cannot judge of the necessity of the case, because the officers are not here to explain, and he who had the chief command has passed away from earth.

I submit, then, that under these circumstances, there is no ground of claim at all upon the Government; and that the parties have really received from the Government $17,000 for what cost them but $2,000. This is a claim for contingent damages; not legal damages—not damages growing out of any recognized principle of liability. If the facts which they allege be true—and they are sustained only by some ex parte testimony—the parties would unquestionably have brought a civil suit against Commodore Porter, in his lifetime, in order to determine to what extent his authority went. Then there would have been a decision as to how far the powers of a military or naval officer of the United States under such circumstances extended.

Mr. MALLORY. I have always been accustomed to hear that any private claim upon the Government, however justly founded, might very well be handed over to one's heirs, executors, and administrators, and that an appeal to Congress for indemnity for the acts of the officers of the Government was about the last resort which a wise man would ever attempt. I am somewhat confirmed in this idea by the opposition to this bill. I am very happy to have an opportunity to record my vote in its favor, and to answer presumptions of fact and law which have been here made against it. And first, I know that the honorable Senator who opposes this bill, when he finds he has totally misapprehended and totally misstated the facts, will be the first to say so. I will commence where the honorable Senator left off—that this is a speculative claim. This idea, I suppose, is based upon the presumption, that an individual has no right to compete with the Government, has no right to make a purchase with the view of selling to the Government. I will not discuss that proposition for a moment. I do not suppose that any sensible man denies the right of a private individual to make a purchase in view of the value of his property being enhanced by the wants of the Government; but the fact is, that years before the proposition was held out to the Government by our merchants and citizens to suppress piracy in the Gulf of Mexico, the purchase was negotiated. This purchase was undertaken upon private account for one gentleman, who sold out to three others, making four proprietors long before any suggestions of its occupancy by the Government of the United States was indulged in. Instead of these parties giving $2,000 for this property, it has cost them at least $50,000. Instead of the island being over seven hundred acres, it is four and a half miles long by a little over a mile wide.

It appears that in 1821 and 1822 the Government became impressed, through the memorials of merchants, ship-masters, and others, with the necessity of suppressing piracy in the Gulf of Mexico, and on the shores of Cuba. A depot and rendezvous for this purpose were absolutely essential, and no other point in that vicinity could by any possibility be selected as a rendezvous. The wants of the Government therefore compelled them to take Key West. It was at that time private property. It was a valuable Spanish grant, which was confirmed under the treaty with Spain, and subsequently recognized as legal by the proper tribunal. The purchase of this grant, and the necessary steps in order to have their title confirmed, cost these proprietors over $50,000. What orders did the Government give to Commodore Porter? A great deal has been said about the injury to private property, and suits to be brought against the officer. The orders of Commodore Porter were, to proceed to the island of Key West and occupy it. How could he occupy it without excluding those already in occupation? So far from that island being then a resort for smugglers and pirates, it was inhabited by respectable citizens of the United States, men of wealth and property, who had moved there knowing that it was one of the most salient points in that part of the country, knowing that it must become the great depot for the southwestern trade, and for the manufacture of salt, then paying a duty of ten cents per bushel; who had established commission houses, large warehouses, and made great preparations for carrying on trade with Cuba, Porto Rico, and the West Indies generally. Commodore Porter went there, and found the island populated; he found municipal authorities there, and he took possession of the island. We are now told that if he exercised his possession to the injury of private property, the parties must look to him for indemnification. From whom did his orders proceed? From the United States—from the sovereign power—he had orders to occupy the island.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator be kind enough to refer me to those orders? I got them from the report of the committee of the House of Representatives in 1848, and I am at variance with him as to the question of fact. There is no order to occupy the island as I understand it.

Mr. MALLORY. The order was to establish a depot and rendezvous, and who ever heard of a depot and a rendezvous without the occupation of land? Can there be such a thing? Not at all. It is absolutely necessary to occupy the land. The officer did occupy the land. He erected his hospital—he erected his barracks—he erected his prisons—he erected his repairing and refitting yards there—he had his galleys there. The inhabitants were excluded from the occupation of their own soil—they were precluded from selling their own property. The Commodore only confirmed such grants as he chose, and he exercised all the rights of eminent domain. All this was done under the authority of the Government. It was continued for a period of three years. Now, does such occupation, independent and apart from all advantages derived by the Government from it, in defiance of private rights, give any right to indemnification? I presume there can be no doubt upon that subject; but the idea is sought to be set up, that because, perhaps, the island itself derived a benefit from such occupation, that might be put as an offset against the use of private property in opposition to the wishes of the owners. The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has been unanimous, expressly sets forth all this evidence of occupancy, and all the injuries, or most of the injuries done to private property. And there is no idea set up there, that the island was enhanced in the slightest degree by the occupation. On the contrary, being somewhat familiar with that part of the country, I am free to confess, that absolutely more injury than the United States can ever pay for by their occupancy, occurred in consequence of that occupancy. I know the fact, that many had to leave the island in consequence of its occupancy by the Government. I know the fact, that citizens were tied up and punished under martial law. The law of Commodore Porter was military law—he occupied the island from the necessity of his order to establish a naval depot and rendezvous. Such a one could not have been established but by the occupation of the island. This occupation brought the yellow fever among the inhabitants. It prevailed among the sailors, and was introduced among the citizens, and gave to Key West the character and reputation of being a sickly place.

There is no doubt that this occupation of land against the wishes of bona fide owners does create a valid claim against the Government for indemnification. But we are told that the claim has been paid in part or in whole. I undertake to say here in my place, that not the first dollar—not the first cent has ever been paid. It is true that the United States did, years and years subsequent to the occupation of the island, purchase a site for a custom-house. In consideration of the fact that the Government did want the site for a custom-house, the proprietors sold it to them for half the price which it would have commanded from private citizens. Lots adjoining that have since been sold within a very recent period, for a much larger price than that for which the Government obtained the site for a custom-house. The giving, therefore, by the proprietors to the Government of the site for a custom-house at a price less than they would have obtained from individuals, was a favor to the United States, and not to the parties. The United States subsequently purchased a site for a barracks, but that was a few years ago, comparatively speaking—a long time after these events occurred. They paid, too, for this, a very moderate price—much less than an individual would have had to pay in open market. They purchased other sites and occupied other land, and paid for it at very moderate prices; but by doing that they have not refunded any damages which the parties sustained years ago in consequence of the military occupation of the island by Commodore Porter for the Government.

There have been two favorable reports in the House of Representatives on this identical claim. I am not certain as to whether additional testimony has or has not been taken since 1840. I looked over all the testimony in the case, and I there found some testimony taken by myself. When I occupied a judicial station in the State of Florida, citizens came before me voluntarily—merchants and others who resided on the island at the time Commodore Porter occupied it, and as much entitled to credit as any citizens of the United States—and gave testimony, though they themselves were against any large claim on the United States for the occupation of the island, that something ought to be paid. Their testimony is upon record.

So far from the island being in want of protection before the United States occupied it, it was inhabited, and no pirate has ever put his foot on its soil since it was transferred to the United States by Spain, long before its occupation by the United States as a naval depot and rendezvous. The idea, therefore, that the United States have paid $17,000 for what cost the proprietors but $2,000, is perfectly untenable. Two thousand dollars may have been the original price negotiated with Salas; but as I understand this purchase, the whole cost to the proprietor, from beginning to end, could not have been less than $50,000. But if it cost only $500—if it were a gift to them, how can that disturb the claim? What has that to do with the claim? Is the measure of damages for the unjust occupation of the island to be judged of or to be ascertained by the price which the proprietors pay for it? Why the island to-day, or when the United States purchased land to the amount of $17,000, it was worth perhaps a hundred thousand times as much as the parties originally gave for it. It probably could not be purchased for that now. With reference to the southwestern trade, the whole trade of the Gulf and of the Spanish Main, it is one of the most salient and important positions in the United States. I will here say, that in 1852, judging from the past, judging from the statistics already before us, $200,000,000 worth of property of the Eastern, Middle, and Western States, will pass in sight, and almost within hailing distance of this very island—the Eastern States in shipping; the Middle States in manufactures; the Western States in agricultural products. It was in view of its salient position that the owners and occupiers of the land purchased it from the original proprietors. Now, because they were ahead of their time, and obtained this important position for a moderate sum, no matter what that sum may have been, are we to be told that the United States will not pay damages for the unjust occupation of the island?

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to inform myself upon this bill, and therefore I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Florida to a point about which I require some information. I see that the bill provides that the accounting officers, in calculating these damages, are to take into consideration the benefits and advantages which accrued to the United States from the occupation of the island of Key West, as well as the injury suffered by its owners. I am not clear that the benefits and advantages resulting to the United States are, under the Constitution of the United States, a legitimate inquiry in ascertaining the value to be paid for private property taken for public uses. I would like to hear the Senator on that point.

Mr. MALLORY. The bill introduced by the Naval Committee is precisely in so many words the bill reported to the House of Representatives by the Naval Committee, at a former session. In reporting that bill, the Naval Committee did not feel disposed to make any alteration in it; but I am perfectly willing that the clause objected to by the Senator from New York shall be stricken out. All I aim at is, that the Government should display some disposition to pay these parties, who have been kept out of payment for the use of their property for twenty years. In drawing up this bill, and in leaving the amount to be decided by the accounting officers, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, under the rules laid down by the Attorney General, that those officers, with the law before them, and the principles of equity and justice to guide them, would sufficiently guard the interests of the Government, and that no great harm would result from the latitude allowed them. But, if the Senate thinks proper, I will at once agree to strike out this clause of the bill, if it is untenable, and let the bill stand on its other merits. All that I desire is, that these parties shall not be turned away after their claim has been so long delayed. They have never yet been repaid a single dollar. The United States have purchased land from them for a custom-house and barracks, and other purposes; but I am certain that if those lands were sold to individuals, they would bring double the price which the Government has paid for them.

Mr. BAYARD. It is perfectly certain, that, if we are to decide this case upon the private knowledge of the Senator from Florida, apart from the documents presented, I am entirely mistaken in the conclusions which I have drawn from the facts. But it would be a new theory of Government, if the individual knowledge of a Senator, apart from the proof submitted, lame and loose, and ex parte as that proof is, was to form the ground of the decision of the Senate in reference to the propriety of allowing a claim. I stated the size of Key West from the documents in the case, as being an island of seven hundred acres. The Senator says it is larger. That is immaterial. If it is larger, the argument is stronger. I am perfectly willing, as regards the damages which are claimed, to place myself upon the legal position, which has not been and cannot be, answered by the Senator, that the Government is not responsible for the acts of Commodore Porter, which were done outside of his orders, and which violated the individual rights of the parties. If he did commit such acts, their redress was against him. A resort to a court of justice was the proper mode to have obtained redress, if they believed they could have sustained themselves in a court; and if they would have sustained the encounter there, they would have brought the matter before the courts; and I say the fact that they did not so seek it, forms a strong presumption, in my mind, that they were not prepared to make such an issue. I always distrust ex parte evidence, and I think there is no safety unless you do. It is to be scrutinized with much greater strictness than you establish in other cases.

The Senator tells us that the claimants have received nothing for damages. The petition admits that they received three thousand six hundred and odd dollars for wood. Is that nothing? It admits the fact that $4,000 were paid for the ground occupied by the custom-house; that $3,200 were paid for the ground occupied by the barracks; and that $6,800 have been paid since for other property. That makes the amount I stated. I stated these facts to show that the property which had been occupied, under the orders of the Government, by Commodore Porter, had been paid for. I say so still. The order of the Government to Commodore Porter was to establish a depot on the island. There can be no mistake about the extent of the order. There is nothing more in the papers—nothing more in the order of the Secretary to him—than, "You will establish at Thompson's Island, usually called 'Key West, a depot, and land the ordnance and 'marines to protect the stores and provisions; if, however, you shall find any important objection to the place, and a more suitable and convenient one can be found, you are at liberty to select it 'as a depot.'" The honorable Senator asks, How could they occupy this without taking the land? I said that they took a portion of the land, but not more than is occupied now; and that, beyond that, if Commodore Porter assumed jurisdiction over the whole island and established martial law to prevent persons building and to paralyze commerce by arbitrary orders, he went beyond the authority conferred upon him; and if he did that, then, there the opinion, as a matter of law, announced by Mr. Legaré, strictly applies, and there is no responsibility on the part of the Government.

But I am free to say, that from the reading of this testimony—it is not necessary for me to go through it before the Senate now—the impression on my mind is, that this is a matter of dispute in which there was fault on both sides, and this claim is a prepared claim; and that the parties at the time carried on a series of petty disputes with Commodore Porter and his officers, with a view to make a subsequent claim against the Government of the United States; in order to get speculative damages. That is what I meant by the allegation of speculative damages. As I know none of these parties, it is indifferent to me; but I cannot resist the conclusion to which I have come; and if I were to use strong language, I should say that the claim is a fraud upon the Government from its beginning to its end. That is the impression which these papers make on my mind; because on the 7th of January, 1821, these parties made a communication calculated to draw the attention of the Government to this island, which was then as the reporting officer says, desolate, and that is the time to which I referred. Whether that was the condition of the island is immaterial. The honorable Senator says it was settled. That was when Commodore Porter went there, a year after security was given by the establishment of a guard by the United States. It was after the United States had assumed jurisdiction over it for the first time. But before that—on March 28, 1822—Commodore Perry in his report, said expressly that—

"Heretofore the Florida keys have been the resort of smugglers, New Providence wreckers, and, in fact, of a set of desperadoes, who have paid but little regard either to law or honesty. The present establishment, though on a small scale, will, I conjecture, (with the assistance of the settlers,) be enabled to keep these lawless people from this island. But I would suggest the necessity of an early augmentation of force, if it be only for the purpose of enforcing the revenue laws."

It was not until April, 1823, that Commodore Porter was ordered there. When he went, a settlement may have arisen, because the Government had determined to have an establishment there, and had placed a guard to protect the island from smugglers and pirates. A settlement may have grown up in the interim. When Commodore Porter went there, the island was settled in part; but he was authorized to establish a depot and barracks. The alleged aggression consists in the taking of what was not paid for, by arbitrary power on the part of Commodore Porter. Conceding those acts to have taken place, they did not come within the terms of the order, and he was responsible for them. The fact that the parties did not choose to sue him in 1825 for acts alleged, by ex parte proof in part established here, to have been committed, and did not hold him responsible, affords to me a presumption that those facts could have been met by counter proof to sustain the course which he was obliged to take.

Mr. DAWSON. What were the acts complained of?

Mr. BAYARD. The acts charged are, that Commodore Porter prohibited them from building on their property according to the plan of a town they had laid out; that he arrested a workman of one of the owners when he attempted to build on the property of that owner, and decided that it was property occupied by the United States; that he gave them orders to pen up their hogs, and that in consequence they were obliged to abandon them; that he prohibited settlers going there and locating without his authority; that he established martial law; that he punished individuals; that he interfered, as to vessels that were stranded there, in the jurisdiction of one of these parties—John Whitehead—who was a notary public, and who, being a notary public under the laws of Florida, pronounced judgment for salvors; and made salvage to be allowed; and, in order to carry out his own decree, he being entitled to one per cent. commission—this is one ground of the claim—made an order for the condemnation of a vessel on the plea of salvage. There was no other jurisdiction to do it. He was allowed, under the laws, one per cent. commission. To carry his order into effect, he put it into the hands of P. Green & Co., a firm of which he was a member, and directed that they should receive the commission of five per cent. To this Commodore Porter objected, and said that, as regarded the share to which the officers were entitled, he would not permit it to be sold by that auctioneer, at five per cent. commission, because one per cent. was the compensation. Whether this was right or wrong, I cannot determine, nor need I. I mention it as one of the series of acts complained of. But all the acts complained of, if they took place, arose from the unauthorized conduct of Commodore Porter. According to the orders received from the Navy Department, he was to establish a barracks and depot there. They did not require the whole island to be taken possession of. No orders were given to him to take possession of the whole. His orders did not require martial law to be established. If he established it, he did it at his own peril. They did not require that an individual should not be permitted to build a house on his own property without the permission of Commodore Porter. If he required that, he did it at his own peril. These are the claims for damages. The property occupied by the barracks and custom-house has been paid for. The wood was paid for in 1846. The Navy Department having examined officers, and the proof being indefinite, averaged the quantity of wood for the number of vessels there, and the probable consumption, and allowed $3,600 for the wood consumed. In the case of the hogs, it is very clear that Commodore Porter had no right to give the order to pen them up, and the Government are not responsible for it. It was illegal. If the hogs were destroyed, unless they were taken for the use of the Government, certainly there is no ground against the Government for compensation. If Senators feel any doubt on the principle involved here, let them read the opinion of Mr. Legare in the Sibbald case. They will see that the ground for damages in that case was the same as here. Mr. Legare clearly lays down the rule for damages. It is found in the second volume of the Opinions of Attorneys General. It discriminates the extent to which the Government is responsible. Within the principles of that opinion, there is not one item in the claim here that has not been paid for.

Whether the price of $4,000 for the land on which the custom-house stands at Key West, which had been barren land before, was extravagant, does not appear in the papers. It does appear that the parties were willing to take it. I see nothing of liberality on their part towards the Government. I do not see that they charged less than the value of the land, unless they supposed that additional advantages would be gained to them, arising from the erection of the custom-house near their property, and that they would receive benefits in that way. At all events, it was a matter of agreement, and they were paid for the ground. So, too, as to the barracks. I can see no good claim for damages upon the Government on the part of the claimants here.

There is one other fact which I will mention. There is a vast deal of indefinite proof in this case. The papers show that Salas was the Spanish grantee in 1815. The communication which was made by Simonton to the Department, inviting attention to this island, is dated December 7, 1821.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the Senator from Delaware read that?

Mr. BAYARD. I will. The Senate will understand that at the time this communication was written, Simonton was not the owner of the island, but whether he was then in a negotiation for its purchase, we cannot tell. I think that probably he was; and that was one of the reasons why I gave it the name of a speculative claim:

"Key West" is a small island, immediately on the edge of the Florida stream, situated in latitude—, seventy-five miles north by west from Havana, and eighty-five miles from Matanzas, and quite contiguous to most of the outposts on the north side of Cuba—say, Bay of Honda, Cabanas, Mariel, St. John's de los Remedios, Arraco, &c., &c., which are all places of considerable trade, and depend almost entirely upon Havana for their supplies; it has an uncommon large and safe harbor, where men-of-war, with any draught of water, may enter and lie with safety; it has two never-failing springs of water, one of which is quite convenient to the harbor, and wood in great abundance. An establishment at this island would be of great importance to the Government, as well as to the merchants of the United States, as a harbor and rendezvous for our vessels of war, it being one of the most commanding places on the whole coast of Florida.

"The revenue that would arise from the importation of sugar, coffee, &c., productions of the Island of Cuba, as well as from other places in the Bay of Mexico, the distance being so short that an immense deal of property would be sent there, as well as specie, in vessels which seldom go now from the coast of Cuba, and receive in payment there the productions of the United States, which trade would be of great advantage to the American commerce. It would be an excellent harbor for our merchant vessels to touch at bound to and from the Bay of Mexico to the United States, in cases of distress, which too frequently happen when they have no other place to touch at except a port in the Island of Cuba, where they are subject to heavy expenses.

"It is the only eligible situation for a depot of wrecked property on the whole coast of Florida. We are at this time wholly dependent on the wreckers of New Providence for the protection of our property in the case of shipwreck; and when that occurs, it is carried to New Providence, which affords a living for more than five hundred persons, and employs fifty or sixty vessels, and produces a large revenue to the Government, and a great pecuniary benefit to the merchants of that place, because a salvage is generally allowed of from fifty to seventy-five per cent.

"If this place was made a port of entry, it would in all probability become a place of depot for the productions of other countries, particularly those of Great Britain and France, as it may be termed a key for the whole of the Bay of Mexico and the north side of the Island of Cuba. Arrangements are now making, and in the event of this place being made a port of entry, warehouses will immediately be erected, under the direction of merchants regularly established there. J. W. SIMONTON.

"HAVANA, December 7, 1821."

It appears by the papers that Simonton did not purchase from Salas, in Havana, until December 26, 1821, within thirty days after the date of this letter, as I have said. He was not the owner at the date of the letter, but judging from its character and from the subsequent purchase, he was negotiating for it, and endeavored to obtain the location of the naval depot there for the improvement of the property, and in that way he expected to make a valuable purchase. He paid $2,000 to Salas; what his other expenses have been since, we have no evidence here. The Senator from Florida may be right in his estimate of what it has cost him. But we have nothing to do with that. I spoke of what the property cost at the time of the purchase. It cost $2,000, as the value of the property antecedent to the time when the United States established the depot there. Simonton, when he was not the owner of the island, called the attention of the Government to the establishment of that depot, probably with a view to that purchase. I do not say that he is not entitled to receive full compensation for all the property which the Government took from him. But the Government has paid for all it took; and he comes here and asks Congress to pass a bill to pay him for damages grounded upon acts of officers, which, if true in point of fact, transcended the orders under which they were directed to establish a naval depot there, and for which they were responsible, and for which they would have been made individually responsible, if the claimants had appeared in a court of justice and established their liability, with the evidence on both sides.

This island had not exactly the extraordinary character which Simonton attributed to it in his letter. The Government first sent Captain Perry there, and he made a report. Then there was a subsequent survey made by Commodore Patterson. That report is rather adverse to a permanent location there, and gives strong and good reasons why it would not do. It contains the statement of one fact about water, which is different from Simonton's statement, that there was not a sufficient supply of water and wood to depend on. So it appears in the statement of Commodore Porter, when he went there in 1823. His first report is dated April 16, 1823, and in it he says:

"For the last two weeks our movements and occupations have been so varied, that, to enter into a full detail would swell too much this communication. To be brief, therefore, I shall merely state, that within that time we have built our storehouses on Thompson's Island, landed all our stores, collected together all the schooners of the squadron, and stationed them at different points on the coast of Cuba."

I presume there can be no doubt that a rendezvous, for a period of three years, of a fleet of eleven vessels, if these owners had their own establishments, must have been a source of great emolument to them. But that is thrown out of view, and they complain of damages caused by the conduct of the commanding officer, which was illegal, if it took place. Again Commodore Porter says:

"Thrown, as we are, on a barren and desolate island, that does not supply even water, I hope our situation may be made as free from sufferings as the Department can, without inconvenience to the public interest, make it."

Again, November 19, 1823, he says:

"The fixing an establishment at Thompson's Island, for rendezvous and supplies, as my instructions required, has had the most happy effect in attaining the object in view."

Did that authorize him to take the whole island into his possession? The island I stated to contain seven hundred acres. The Senator from Florida says it is larger. Be it so. The instructions, or the report upon them, do not look as if he was to take possession of more than was necessary for the purposes of the Government, for the barracks and storehouses. But he continues:

"Its vicinity to Havana, placed, as it were, in the thoroughfare of vessels sailing through the Gulf, makes it, in many points of view, an object of great importance to the United States; and although for three months in the year it must ever remain sickly, while existing causes continue, it is, from its extraordinary salubrity for the remainder of the year, worthy a closer examination, to ascertain whether they may not be eradicated. It is my opinion that, by thinning the woods and draining off the heavy rains of the month of June, thereby promoting a free circulation of air, evaporation, and dispersion of the water rendered stagnant by the excessive heat of June, and which causes the rapid decomposition of the vegetable matter with which the island abounds, the months of August, September, and October, might be made sufficiently healthy for the residence of man; but at present, the poisonous effluvia arising from these causes is almost certain destruction to whoever breathes it."

"Had I been aware of its pernicious effects, I could, without any inconvenience, have guarded against them by an earlier removal of the ships; but it took us by surprise, and the malignity of the disease was unparalleled. It is certain that it originated on the island; for our ships, with the exception of those sent to work on shore, have in their crews enjoyed uncommon health."

In another letter of October, he speaks of it in the same way. The proprietors themselves, in a memorial—when or where presented does not appear, it was not to the committee—make a statement to which I will refer. It is alleged that it was presented to the Navy Department. The answer of the Secretary of the Navy is, that there is not a copy of any such paper in the Department. It seems improbable that it ever could have been presented, or if presented and not acted upon, that some further action had not been taken by the memorialists, if the grounds of their complaint were correct. They say:

"The proprietors of the island were highly gratified in this early success in gaining that protection to commerce which the previous exposed situation of the island required, and their persons and property thereon, which were likewise very unsafe at that time."

On the whole, looking at this case with the best examination which I have been able to give it, I can see no damages claimed which are not embraced in the report of the committee of the Senate made in 1840. There is not a paper attached to the petition which is subsequent in point of date to the report of that committee. There are no new facts, unless in the following papers, of which the Senate will judge the value: there are three individuals who swear that, in their opinion, a proper and reasonable compensation, by way of rent for this island, ought to be paid by the United States to Simonton and others. Two of them swear to twenty thousand dollars a year, and the other to fifteen thousand a year. What force, as evidence, that has, and what weight it should have, the Senate can judge. But, apart from that, there is no evidence of the existence of any cause for relief which was not before the committee in 1840, or which might have been before them, because it was all in existence, according to the dates of the papers which are before us. After deliberation, after the Secretary of the Navy reported against the claim, the committee unanimously reported against it as "an unreasonable claim." That is the language of the report.

Mr. SEWARD. How is the committee now?

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 36.

Mr. BAYARD. The committee, at this session, have reported in favor of the claim. I do not know whether the Senator from New York was here when I made my objection to the form of this bill. I objected to it on the ground that the general rule established here ought to be sufficient to defeat the bill as it stands; but I went afterwards into matters that showed the claim was not justifiable, and, therefore, not worthy of reference. In conclusion, the motion which I make—if it will not cut off debate—is, that this bill be indefinitely postponed. If it will cut off debate, I will withdraw it.

Mr. SEWARD. I will submit to the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] in a very few words, what I have to say about this bill. I shall not detain the Senate any length of time. I think the bill is in very great danger, if pressed to a vote, of being lost. Still, for one, I am of opinion that there is a claim to some extent, and I think the bill may be modified in such a way as to provide for a fair and just settlement of that claim.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from New York will give way, I will move to postpone the further consideration of this subject, as it seems to involve some questions of interest, that we may go into Executive session.

Mr. SEWARD. If the Senator will allow me, I will state some amendments which I propose to submit for consideration, and then the subject may be postponed. I think it would remove much difficulty by inserting the word "examine" before "audit" in the following phrase: "Give to the Secretary of the Treasury power to audit and settle;" and that a further difficulty would be removed by striking out the words "upon principles of equity and justice," as I suppose the bill will mean the same whether they are in or out; and then to strike out the words "and in settling" upon these principles, they shall ascertain as nearly as practicable, the benefits and advantages which accrued to the United States from the occupancy of it, and also the injuries which resulted to the owners of it," and to insert after the words "to pay" the words "the amount, if any, which shall be so found to be due," so as to make the bill read—

"Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, examine, audit, and settle the claim of John W. Simonton and others, owners of the island of Key West, in the State of Florida, on account of its occupancy by the Government of the United States as a naval and military post during the years 1823, 1824, 1825, and 1826, and to pay the amount, if any, which shall be found to be due, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. MALLORY. I concur in the amendments of the Senator from New York. I will accept any amendments which go to pay these parties anything for the occupation of the island. And here I beg leave to make one remark in reply to the Senator from Delaware in relation to this claim having been paid. He insisted, that with the exception of the wood, they had no claim, and that the wood was paid for. If that were so, of course they would not be paid for again under this bill; but with that exception, not one item has been paid for. The sum of $17,000 is the result of purchases made by the Government long subsequent to the events set up, when the Government came in as a purchaser, at the same time as private individuals, and purchased lands from the proprietors on which to erect the custom-house, barracks, &c. It is not embraced in the original claim at all.

Mr. SEWARD. If the Senator from Delaware will withdraw his motion to postpone indefinitely, I will offer my amendments, and move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday next.

Mr. BAYARD. I will withdraw my motion in order to enable the Senator to offer his amendments, and then I shall move to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I offer the amendments which I have read, and ask for the question upon them.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendments offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that the amendments of the Senator from New York will materially affect the bill. In order to afford an opportunity for the examination of the subject, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 13, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DANIEL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. D. said: I beg leave to state that, in consequence of the little attention which was paid to private business during the last Congress, the Private Calendar has become greatly enlarged. I trust that this Congress will not regard this private business with the same censurable indifference.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion for a moment, in order to give me the opportunity of making a personal explanation. I will renew the motion after I have made it.

Mr. DANIEL. I will withdraw for the gentleman.

Mr. OLDS. Perhaps the motion which I propose to make is a privileged motion; at least I trust the House will permit me to offer it.

On day before yesterday, I had lying upon my desk a Senate bill, in connection with several others, which I had been directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report to the House, and which I expected to report as soon as committees were called for reports. In this condition the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I was called to the chair, and left the bills lying upon my desk. After the committee rose, I put the bills, as I supposed, into my drawer; but, on examination, I find that the Senate bill is missing.

The SPEAKER. What was the number of the bill?

Mr. OLDS. I do not recollect the number; but it was a bill declaring a plank road a post road. I ask that a message be sent to the Senate requesting a copy of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. I now press my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE WATROUS.

Mr. VENABLE. I ask my colleague to withdraw his motion for one moment, in order for me to present a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, which is very urgent. I will renew it as soon as it is made.

Mr. DANIEL. I will withdraw for my colleague.

Mr. VENABLE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to inform the House that there has been a memorial by Mr. William Alexander and others, making charges against the Hon. John C. Watrous, judge of the United States court for the district of Texas referred to the committee. Upon examination into this matter, the committee have found it necessary to ask the House for authority to send for persons and papers, and to take testimony on the subject of those charges. I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and papers, with authority to examine witnesses, under oath, in relation to the charges made against John C. Watrous, judge of the United States court for the district of Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What is the nature of those charges?

Mr. VENABLE. I will, with the indulgence of the House, state the nature of the charges for the satisfaction of the gentleman. A memorial has been presented to this House, charging Judge

Watrous, of Texas, with sundry misdemeanors and offences. Among other things, he is charged with practicing law and receiving fees in the State of Texas touching matters which had come before and been decided upon by himself—or touching those of a similar character. He is charged with adjudicating cases in which he was personally interested, and with certain violations of the laws of Texas, which, the memorialists declare, militate against the purity of his character as a judge. All of which the committee think should be examined into.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand the gentleman from North Carolina to say that this is an examination preliminary to an impeachment?

Mr. VENABLE. It is. At least the committee think the matter should be looked into, and the nature of the facts, which that examination will develop, will determine whether the committee will recommend a further prosecution of the case. I ask that the resolution may be adopted.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina one question: Does the Committee on the Judiciary propose to bring witnesses from Texas, or to examine them there?

Mr. VENABLE. I will say to the gentleman from New York, that must be for the committee to determine. The committee would, with great reluctance, go to the expense of sending to Texas for witnesses. But so important is the purity of the ermine of our judges, that the question of inconvenience and expense is one which ought not to be taken into consideration, if the country is satisfied, or the committee are satisfied that the charges are well founded.

Several MEMBERS. That's right.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to propound another question to the gentleman. By whom were these charges preferred?

Mr. VENABLE. By a certain William Alexander, a lawyer, practicing in Texas. The committee, however, have had other evidence—ex parte to be sure—sufficient to satisfy their minds that the matter ought to be examined into.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. VENABLE. My colleague [Mr. DANIEL] yielded me the floor upon my promise to renew his motion. In accordance with that promise, I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I appeal to the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw that motion, to allow me to introduce, by general consent, a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. DANIEL. I will hear the gentleman's resolution.

The resolution was then read for information, by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the military storekeeper, on duty in New Mexico, upon the same footing, as regards compensation, with the military storekeeper at arsenals of construction, during the time he may be on duty in that Territory.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced and adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I inquire of the Chair, if there is not a special order pending?

The SPEAKER. There is a special order, but it cannot be reached until the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and no motion has been submitted for that purpose.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to make a report from the Committee on Private Land Claims. I will state that I was away when the committees were called for reports the other day.

Mr. DANIEL objected.

Mr. D. I now press my motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion prevailed.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. DISNEY in the chair.)

RELIEF OF HEIRS OF JOHN JACKSON.

The first bill that came up in order for the consideration of the committee, was House bill No. 95, being a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Jackson, deceased, for the loss of an arm on board of the ship Bon Homme Richard, under John Paul Jones.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal heirs and representatives of John Jackson, deceased, who lost an arm on board the Bon Homme Richard, in the action with the British frigate Serapis, such sum as will equal a pension at the rate of $6 per month, from the 15th November, 1779, to the day of his death.

The CHAIRMAN. I am advised that a motion is pending to report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GOODENOW. I would ask for the reading of the report of the committee, and after that, I have some other evidence, which I wish to present to the consideration of the House before that recommendation is acted upon.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise for the purpose of suggesting, that inasmuch as this bill was reported from the Committee on Military Pensions, by the honorable member from New Hampshire, [Mr. Tuck,] who is not now in his seat, and as that gentleman was entitled to the floor upon this bill, I believe, and takes some interest in the question—

Mr. GOODENOW. I will state, that when the gentleman from New Hampshire, who reported this bill, left this city, he put into my hands the papers relating to it, and desired me to present some considerations to the House in reference to the passage of the bill. I ask, therefore, the reading of the report in the first instance, and then respectfully to submit some considerations to the House why the bill ought to pass.

Mr. MILLSON. I supposed that the friends of this bill desired its postponement. My object was to have the bill passed over, without losing its place upon the Calendar. But if the friends of the bill desire it to be acted upon to-day, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that a motion is now pending that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GOODENOW. I do not desire to take up the time of this House, if it is the desire of the friends of the bill that it should be laid aside until the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] returns. I desire to present some considerations why the motion to lay it aside, with the recommendation that it do not pass, should not prevail. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report of the committee was then read by the Clerk. It represents:

"That, from the documents submitted to the committee in this case, it appears that while Captain John Paul Jones was cruising off the Spurn, on the coast of England, in the American ship-of-war Bon Homme Richard, on the 22d day of September, 1779, John Jackson, a British pilot, came on board his ship, mistaking it for a British ship-of-war; that Captain Jones, requiring the assistance of a pilot while near the banks on that coast, detained him on board his ship, and he was there employed as the pilot of said ship in the action which took place between the same and the Serapis, in which action the said John Jackson lost an arm. In consideration of the services of said Jackson, and his severe misfortune, Captain Jones paid him one hundred ducats, and gave him a written promise in behalf of the United States, that he should receive half-pay as a pilot the remainder of his life, to commence from the date of said writing, and payable every six months by the American ambassador at the court of France, upon proper proof of identity. It does not appear that this engagement of Captain Jones, in behalf of the United States, has ever been performed. The attention of the old Congress was called to this subject by a letter from the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, dated September 20, 1785, and it underwent the examination of a committee, who subsequently made the following report:

"The committee to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary for Foreign Affairs of the 20th September, 1785, with its enclosures, beg leave to report:

"That it appears to your committee that while Captain J. P. Jones was hovering on the coast of England, in the year 1779, John Jackson, a British pilot, came on board him, supposing him to be British; that Captain Jones found it convenient to detain him as a pilot, and in the action with the Serapis which ensued, this man lost an arm. It further appears to your committee, from a letter of Captain Jones, that the second lieutenant of the Bon Homme Richard was, with twenty others, at the time of the battle with the Serapis, on board Jackson's pilot boat, and that when Captain Jones found it impossible to prevent the Bon Homme Richard from sinking, Jackson's pilot boat was of singular service in saving the men, particularly the wounded, some of whom, Captain Jones is persuaded, would have been drowned had not been furnished with the means of saving them.

"It also appears to your committee, that Captain Jones gave this unfortunate man one hundred ducats in hand, and promised him the half-pay of a pilot for the remainder of his life. Whereupon your committee submit to Congress the following resolution:

"Resolved, That $6 per month, a pilot's half-pay, be allowed and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, in half-yearly payments, to John Jackson, of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, in England, who lost an arm on board the Bon Homme Richard, commanded by Captain J. P. Jones, in the action with the Serapis on the 22d day of September, 1779; that said half-pay commence from the 15th day of November, 1779, and continue during the tenure of the natural life of said Jackson; and that the Board of Treasury take order for making the aforesaid half-yearly payment on a certificate from two or more magistrates, expressing the place where the said John Jackson may be then living, and that he is really the same person in whose favor this grant is made."

"Which said report is indorsed as follows:

"Report on the case of John Jackson, a British pilot, taken by J. P. Jones. Entered. Read the 25th day of September, 1785."

"No. 9. Messrs. Howell, Long, Kean."

"It does not appear that any further action was ever had upon this report."

"It further appears to the committee that the said John Jackson died in the year 1815; that he had three children—one son and two daughters; that his son, James Jackson, came to this country after the decease of his father to prosecute this claim, and deceased before he had found the evidence before mentioned; that he left one son and only heir, who is now a resident at the Navy-Yard in the city of Washington; that the said James, in his lifetime, claimed to have purchased the right of his two sisters in this demand, and was the sole owner thereof."

"This petition was presented to the last Congress and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, which committee made a favorable report on the 8th day of August, 1848, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs of said John Jackson, but which was not reached in the order of business, and was not acted on by the House. As this claim has heretofore received the favorable consideration of the committees who have had the same in charge, and commands itself to the judgment of this committee, they herewith present a bill for the relief of the petitioners, and recommend its passage."

Mr. GOODENOW. The report of the committee of Congress, bearing date the 20th of September, 1785, which is incorporated into the report accompanying the bill now under consideration, is certified to be correct, by the Secretary of State, Mr. Buchanan. It further appears from the report made in 1848, that there are certain papers connected with this claim, which I ask the indulgence of the House to read for their consideration. The first paper I propose to read, is a copy of a letter, dated Philadelphia, June 27, 1788, from Doctor Franklin to the honorable John Jay. It is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, June 27, 1788.

DEAR SIR: In arranging some old papers, I lately found the enclosed letter from Mr. Blunt, enclosing copy of a certificate of Commodore Jones, in favor of John Jackson. I ought, though so long delayed, to send some answer. Can you inform me whether anything has been done for Jackson, in consequence of the commodore's promise?

I send you, also, two other papers, respecting services formerly done the United States by Mr. Limosin, of Havre, and Mr. Millie, of Lisbon, for your consideration, and to be disposed of as you shall think proper. Please to inform me whether Dohmann is still in America.

With great and sincere esteem, I am ever, my dear friend, yours, most affectionately, B. FRANKLIN.
Hon. J. JAY, Esq.

The next is a letter from Mr. James Blunt, referred to in the report, and is dated London, August 2d, 1785. It is as follows:

LONDON, August 2, 1785.

SIR: Well acquainted, as I am, with your sentiments of philanthropy and benevolence, from the testimony of those friends of yours whom I have the pleasure of being acquainted with, I deem an apology unnecessary for the liberty I take of intruding on your time, as it is to lay before you a case of real distress. A friend of mine has shown me the original of the enclosed papers, and tells me the poor man has placed his whole dependence on the allowance mentioned in them. He has waited for some time the arrival of the American ambassador at this court, to whom he has shown his claim, but been referred by him to Mr. Jefferson, at Paris. If you would be so kind as to inform me what are the proper measures to be taken for assisting this poor man, and your opinion on his case, you will exceedingly oblige me, and increase the veneration and respect which your illustrious character has excited in me.

I beg leave to congratulate you, as well in my own name as in that of my father, Mr. William Blunt, and all his family, on your safe return to this country; and, with the sincerest wishes for your health and enjoyment,

I remain, with great regard, sir, your faithful, humble servant, JAMES BLUNT.

Connected with this is a copy of the original certificate given by Commodore Jones to this John Jackson, and certified to be correct by the Secretary of State.

Mr. POLK. I rise to a question of order. I cannot hear what the gentleman is reading.

Mr. GOODENOW. That certificate is as follows:

I do hereby certify that the bearer, John Jackson, of Hull, came on board the American ship-of-war Bon Homme Richard, under my command, off the Spurn, on the coast of England, on the morning of the 22d September last, he having mistaken the Bon Homme Richard for a British ship-of-war; that I found it necessary to detain him on board, while near the banks on that coast, and afterwards purposed to set himself, with his companion and their boat, at liberty, and reward them for the service that I had obliged them to perform; but, on the day following, when I met with the Baltic fleet, as the pilot boat was some encumbrance, the partner of the bearer was put on board to keep the boat out of harm's way during the action between the Bon Homme Richard and Serapis; after which he was to return and take in the bearer, that they might return home together. The boat, however, did not return, and the poor man had, in the action, the irreparable misfortune to lose an arm. Deeply impressed with a sense of his misfortune, and earnestly desiring to make this poor man and his family what recompense lies in my power, I have given him, this day, one hundred ducats; and I do also promise, in behalf of the United States, that he shall receive half pay, as a pilot, the remainder of his life, to commence from the date hereof, payable every six months, by the American Ambassador at the court of France, upon certificate at each payment, from two or more magistrates, expressing the place where the bearer, John Jackson, is then living, and that he is really and truly the person in whose favor this obligation is granted.

Given, on board the Serapis, at the Texel, November 15, 1779. JOHN PAUL JONES.

Then follows a certificate of two persons, being justices of the peace of His Majesty the King of England, as follows:

Town and County of Kingston-upon-Hull:

We, two of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, aforesaid, and county of the same town, do hereby certify, that John Jackson, of the same town, mariner, (to whom a certificate was given, dated November 15, 1779, under the hands of John P. Jones, thereby promising, on behalf of the United States of America, that the said John Jackson should receive half-pay, as a pilot, the remainder of his life, to commence from the date thereof, payable every six months by the American Ambassador at the court of France,) is now living in the parish of the Holy Trinity, in the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, aforesaid, that he is really and surely the person in whose favor the said certificate was granted.

Given under our hands, this 10th day of June, 1785. HENRY BROODLEY, Mayor.
H. ETHERINGTON.

Then comes a letter from Thomas Jefferson, dated Paris, February 6, 1788, which was transmitted to the President of Congress, from the War Office, by H. Knox:

PARIS, February 6, 1788.

SIR: The enclosed papers, stating the claims of John Jackson, an English pilot, on the justice and liberality of the United States, have been addressed to me, and I can do nothing better than to forward them to you; as I suppose the claim to belong, properly, to your department. I formerly forwarded to the President of Congress an application from the same person, but never learned whether anything was done in it.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most perfect esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant, TH. JEFFERSON.
General Knox.

Enclosed in the above was the following certificate:

Town and County of Kingston-upon-Hull:

We, two of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the town and county aforesaid, do hereby certify, that John Jackson, of the same town, mariner, (to whom a certificate was given, dated November 15, 1776, under the hand of John P. Jones, thereby promising, on behalf of the United States of America, that the said John Jackson should receive half pay as a pilot, the remainder of his life, to commence from the date thereof, payable every six months, by the American ambassador at the court of France,) is now living in the parish of the Holy Trinity, in the town and county of Kingston-upon-Hull, aforesaid, and that he is really and truly the person in whose favor the said certificate was granted.

Given under our hands, the 14th day of January, 1788.

J. PORTER, Mayor.
HEN. BROODLEY.
D. ETHERINGTON.

Now, it seems to me that this evidence which has been read and exhibited here is sufficient to justify this House in coming to the conclusion that this is a just claim upon the Government, and ought to be paid; and that the bill reported by the committee ought to receive the sanction of the House. I submit that the certificate given by John Paul Jones to this unfortunate man, ought to be regarded as pledging the faith of this Government to pay him the sum therein promised to be paid to him; and that the Government, having failed in his lifetime to perform an obligation resting upon it, by virtue of that certificate, given by that distinguished man, we ought now to pass this bill, which will afford relief to the only surviving member of his family, who resides in this city.

I hope the committee will favorably consider this case, and instead of adopting the motion now pending, will direct the bill to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I should be happy to hear from the chairman of the committee in regard to this matter. It seems the gentleman upon that committee, to whom this matter was referred, [Mr. TUCKER] made a favorable report. It is not to be expected that every member of this House can inform himself with regard to all questions, as they come up; hence we have to be governed by the reports of the committees. I think the chairman of each committee, whether he is for or against the report made, ought to give the House the information that may be within his possession, and the benefit of his opinion upon it. For you all know very well, that applications to Congress are referred to the committees, and that the committees divide up the labor, so that a single individual takes a case, and then, when he reports to the committee his conclusions, with his reasons therefor, a bare majority of this committee may be present, and they may agree to the report; but when the report comes to the House, we are to be controlled by the opinion of a single man, or at the most, the opinions of three men.

I am desirous of voting for that bill, and against the motion pending, provided the person who appears here as applicant, is the identical heir of this man, and thus has a right to come here. Yet, I want to know from the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, whether there is satisfactory evidence that this man is the heir of John Jackson, who performed the services for which John Paul Jones promised him pay. For, permit me to say, that if this Englishman, who, through mistake, came on board of one of our vessels, and was there, by the commander, compelled to perform services which were essentially beneficial to the Government and the country, at that time, and in such services, extorted from him—he being the subject of another Government, and subject to its laws—lost his arm, he certainly, above all other men, should be rewarded. He was not working for his country for the benefit of it, but was compelled to work against it for the benefit of us; and, if in that condition he suffered, should we turn round and say that, because he was not one of us, therefore he should not receive the compensation which our own citizens would receive for services similarly performed? Now, I want to know from the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, whether this individual, who makes this application, is the heir of the person entitled to the pension, provided it be granted. Will he give that information to the House?

Mr. MILLSON. I did not desire to have anything to say upon this bill, and I should have preferred that the committee by unanimous consent had passed it over, until the return of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCKER] who had considered it, and reported upon it, both to the committee and to this House. But the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] calls upon me for information upon the subject; and I will say that when this claim was reported to the committee, it was made a subject of conversation. I did not then give any examination into this case, but from the statement made by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TUCKER] to the committee, I remarked that there was, perhaps, a prima facie case in favor of the petitioner, and without meaning to commit myself as to the course I might afterwards, upon examination, find it my duty to take. Yet I thought it due to the claimant, that the petition should not be stifled in the committee, but that it should come before the House, where it might be fully examined. I afterwards made some examination of the case, and I came to the conclusion that the claim was not one which should receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

After the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] has concluded, I may say a word in reference to the subject, but I will now content myself with responding to his specific inquiry—that is, whether the person now appearing as claimant, is the heir at law of the original petitioner? Upon that subject I may say that I did not think the evidence at all satisfactory. I considered it as exceedingly loose. He may be the descendant of John Jackson, or he may not be.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I think that the House, in acting on a report, have the right to presume that the important fact of the right of the petitioner to ask relief of us is established before they consent to a favorable report. I think that ought to be settled in the committee, and that we ought not to have reports made in favor of appropriations of money out of the Treasury without committees being satisfied in regard to all of the facts. I do not understand how the individual member of the committee who reported this bill could have obtained the consent of that committee—of my friend who is at the head of that committee—while there was this doubt existing in relation to the right of this claimant to petition as the heir of Mr. Jackson. I confess, from the answer I have obtained from the chairman of that committee, [Mr. MILLSON], that I am unable to understand why this report has been submitted. As he intimates that he will enlighten the House hereafter upon the subject, and I have no doubt he will, I therefore leave it. I go upon the supposition that the committee found the facts they have reported to exist; and if they did, sir, I ask upon what principle this committee is prepared to deny action in reference to this subject? Will it be said that it shall be passed over because it is a stale claim? Will it be said, if we can successfully resist a just claim for fifty or seventy years, that that is adequate compensation to the claimant? Are we going to establish this nice notion of morality, in this way, by the doubts and suspicions which are thrown out year after year, Congress after Congress, and defeat the honest and just claims of individuals upon us? Will we in-trench ourselves behind the statute of limitations, and say that we will not pay it, thus taking advantage of our own wrong? Here is the letter of John Paul Jones. I do not know whether it was heard by the whole House when read by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. GOODENOW], but I think not. I will, therefore, with the leave of the House, read it.

[Mr. C. here read the certificate of John Paul Jones, (which is published in a preceding column,) given on board the Serapis, at the Texel, and dated November 15, 1779.]

I confess to you, sir, that I knew nothing of this claim until it was presented at the bar of the House this morning. It is difficult for me to conceive of a claim made by the heirs of any man who performed important services to this country that appears more meritorious from the testimony offered here in its support. This man, it is abundantly proved by the document read here, which was authenticated by Benjamin Franklin and the others concerned, rendered important service. His services were thought necessary for the protection of our liberties and property, and for the prosperity of our cause. He was compelled to perform these services against his own country and against his wishes; and for what? Because simply he made a mistake. He having suffered as he did, contrary to his will, in our service, and for our benefit, is it for us to turn around and say that we will not pay him therefor? or rather that we will not treat his heirs as we would treat the heirs of an American citizen? Why, sir, far be it from me to say that I would not honor the draft of John Paul Jones. He tells this Congress that they were services for which he himself put his hands into his pocket and paid; and he also guaranteed that our Government would be just and liberal towards him. If we have not recognized the claim for the services of this man yet, I ask upon what principle we shall now say that it should be resisted? If we do it at all, it must be on account of the long period of time which has elapsed since the important services were rendered. I do not think that is a sufficient reason; and for one I regret most sincerely that the gentleman who reported this bill is not present. I desire some member, more conversant with the business of the House than myself, to devise some way by which the matter can be postponed until the member to whom I referred returns. As is suggested, I will move that the case be postponed till this day two weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion is already pending.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I will ask the gentleman who made the motion now pending, to alter it so as to have this matter postponed for two weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I hope this bill may be laid aside and left in the hands of its friends.

Mr. CARTTER. The bill might as well be disposed of now, as there is a good deal of work upon the Private Calendar. I confess that the obligation does not strike me as it does the honorable member from Connecticut. The obligation is one of the third generation removed from the man who suffered. Now, I believe that it did not enter into the economy of the pension laws of this Government when paying its own citizens for suffering endured and for services performed for the Government, to grant a pension after their decease, and upon the other hand no such pensions were granted. This man died as long ago as 1815. He lived and died a British subject—the subject of an empire which, during the whole period of this man's life, was impressing our own seamen. And who ever heard of the British Government rewarding one of our citizens who had been impressed into their service? But he did not live to appeal to this Government for it. The highest pretension of this case is, as I read it from the report, that his only son came to this country a British subject to appeal to this Government to grant relief—and he died too. With what title? Why the conclusive language of the report is—with the title, as it is said, of his sisters. That is a beautiful kind of title in which to grant a pension—that a British subject came here some thirty-six years ago with the pretense that he had the assignment of his sisters, and that he was the heir of the deceased ancestor. But he is dead too, and the gentleman who makes his appeals here now is said to be his son. In the first place, the ancestor of the present applicant, a British subject—the son of a British subject—the subject of an empire who never rendered corresponding immunity to the impressed citizens of the Republic—has some kind of claim; that is, his father was said to have received the title of his aunts to the claim upon this Government for a pension created after the death of the ancestor.

Now my doctrine is, that this idea of granting pensions to the posterity of a gallant man is all wrong any way. The pension is a personal acknowledgment of the Government to the personal chivalry and services of the citizen. And when a child comes forward, and asks that this Government shall pension services that he never performed, but upon the strength of the chivalry of his ancestor, my reply to him is, that he had better be doing something else more worthy of himself. That I believe should be the economy of the subject. Here you have three generations of British subjects, the earliest ancestor of whom accidentally stumbled into an American privateer, and while there he could not get out of the way of the enemy's shot. I understand, from statements of gentlemen upon the floor, that if he could have got out of the way, he would have been glad to have done so. It appears, at any rate, that he did not love the stars and stripes well enough to remain any longer than he could prevent, for he went on to the soil of Great Britain, died there, and now his descendant comes an applicant here.

Mr. GOODENOW. The report states that he went on board the American vessel by mistake. Being on board, he was compelled by the commander to do service in piloting the ship, and while there he received a wound by which he lost an arm. I wish to say further, that the father of the person who now claims, died in consequence of a wound he received in the service at the navy-yard of this city. I would respectfully inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER], if it is not a fact that, upon the pension rolls of this Government, there are a number of persons who have never renounced their allegiance to Great Britain, and who have done good service in the cause of our country?

Mr. CARTTER. I have not examined the records; but if they have not done it, it is time they were about it. That is all I have to say about that. It is time that all such men were renouncing their allegiance to Great Britain or to their pension, one or the other. The gentleman, in his last suggestion, raised, as an additional argument in support of the bill, in the fact that the father of the present applicant received in the navy-yard a wound of which he died. Fetch him forward; let us pension him. That begins to look somewhat plausible. He was in the American navy-yard, and if he received the wound spoken of, in the service of his country, there may be some propriety in it. But there is this ridiculous feature in the whole bill, and that is, the applicant is here through two generations, and comes forward in virtue of assignments of rights of chivalry. That is the ridiculous feature of it—a right that did not exist, never was granted—a right by assignment of the benevolence of this Government—

Mr. GOODENOW. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir; not now. Even that assignment does not appear authenticated, but appears in the doubtful character, that it was said that he had received an assignment from his spinster sisters in Great Britain of their claims to the chivalry of their ancestor. Now this claim, it appears, passed through old Ben. Franklin's hands, and Thomas Jefferson's too. How did it pass through their patriotic hands? It was a good long time ago. We know the character of old Ben. Franklin, and we know his character was brilliant with justice and purity. How does it happen that this man went unrewarded under the hands of old Ben. Franklin? I am told, too, that it passed through the patriotic supervision of Thomas Jefferson. How does this happen, that this committee, seventy-five years afterwards, is wiser than these patriotic men, under whose eye these things transpired? This is a mystery to me. This claim, instead of growing strong and increasing in excellence by age, appears to be weakened by the fact, that the actors in the drama of which this was a part, suffered these men to go unrewarded, and left this Congress here in 1852 to reward a man who is said to be a grandson, for the prowess of his ancestor—a British subject. My opinion is, that it is all wrong.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not intend to offer a word upon this subject; but as I do not often trouble the House with my feeble voice, I ask permission to make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] who has just taken his seat. He speaks of the chivalry which we are asked to reward. No attempt is made to establish a claim upon the charity, the bounty, the justice of this House upon anything of that kind. It is the case of a man who was pressed into the service of our country by another, who had the moral right to pledge the honor of our country wherever he bore the flag of that country; and while this man was performing the duties incident to his profession, he suffered the loss of an arm, and when paid for his professional services, he was promised a pension to which an American pilot would have been entitled for such a loss. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] strengthens his argument by referring to the time to which this case has been postponed, and asks why it is that the case has never before been brought forward. If there is strength in that question, the answer to it gives more strength. If the report which lies upon your desk—

Mr. CARTER, (interposing.) The gentleman misunderstood me. I asked why it was not granted?

Mr. CHANDLER, (resuming.) Because he was hardly prepared to be represented here, and there was a Thersites, then as now, to raise his voice against it, or there were some from another State to postpone that act of justice which from time to time has been solicited from us. The gentleman talks, too, of postponing this species of pension, and putting it off to the third generation. No pension is asked for the grandson of this sufferer. No money is asked to be given to him upon that ground, but he comes here and appeals to our justice for the pension that was promised under the faith of our nation—promised under the stars and stripes—under the flag of our country, borne by John Paul Jones. If we fail to make that out—if we fail to fulfill the promise of that great representative of our country, I am afraid that some of the people will think that the name of that ship was the representative of the only "good man" there was about it. Is it becoming the representatives of twenty-three millions of people to stand caviling upon a few dollars, because something is pleaded here of time past. They say he was not an American citizen. Why, sir, if he had been an American citizen, he would have been fully rewarded perhaps by the result of that battle in which he suffered and which assisted in securing the independence of our country. But he was not an American, and was forced into the position against the feelings of a Briton. Because he was forced—because he was compelled to serve in our cause, are we not doubly bound to sustain the promise made to him in the name of the country? Has this Congress—have the people of this country, or their representatives, ever doubted the obligations imposed upon them by Captain Paul Jones? Certainly not. It has been delayed, as everything else has been delayed here, from time to time.

The man who becomes a petitioner to this House, however just may be his claim, unless he has security in some other position than this, to force it through, he becomes in danger of losing not only his claim, but his time and the money which he may bring to enforce his claim here, or to sustain him while he is enforcing it. Our delay is proverbial. Shakspeare complains of the "law's delay and the insolence of office." And men have a right to complain here of the law-makers' delay and the tardiness of office. For my own part, if I had met a descendant of that pilot on any shore in the world, I should have felt myself bound to satisfy his necessities and to have contributed not only my portion of what was due to him upon that promise of John Paul Jones, but if I had the power, I should have paid to his latest generation every cent I had. The Congress of the United States protesting a claim of Paul Jones because it is outlawed by time! But we are told that the British never pay. It has been the glory of that wrong-doing country that it always pays. It paid the contemptible traitor who would have betrayed to them our fortress in New York. It paid him well in money, in position, and contempt, as every traitor deserves to be at the hands of an honest people, who may in the time of war have employed him. Having impressed that man into the service of our country, and exposed him to the loss of a limb, do we now say that the time has passed?—do we talk of the chivalry? Why, is that the chivalry in this Congress, that will suffer the promise of Paul Jones, made in the name of his country, to be nullified, non-fulfilled by that country?

I do not wish to occupy the attention of this House further; but it appears to me to be one of those claims which, if it were not so well founded as it is, it would become us Americans to pass at once, and wash our hands of such a charge as we may be liable to, by our neglect. Let us not protest a draft upon our honor, and that of our ancestors. I trust that not a word more will be thought necessary upon the question, and that we shall pass the bill as it is, and as it ought to be.

Mr. MILLSON. During the somewhat lengthy remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] he addressed to me a series of inquiries, which I could not answer at once. I determined to await the conclusion of his address in order that I might give a suitable time to a reply.

The gentleman, however, after making an inquiry—one of a series—paused and requested an immediate answer. In compliance with the gentleman's request, I gave him as much information as I could furnish, and stated, in accordance with his own urgent entreaty, that I would, after he had finished his remarks, make the further response which he seemed to invite. And for this the gentleman has remarked that I have declared that I mean to enlighten the House upon this question!

Sir, the gentleman must have strong confidence in his own power to enlighten the House, for he gets up and declares that he knows nothing about the case; professes to be seeking information; complains that the chairman of the committee who reported the bill did not volunteer to give information to the House, obtains but one reply—but one item of information from the source to which he addressed himself, and that not at all favoring the views of the petitioners; and then starts away and goes on to deliver an elaborate argument in favor of the claim, the merits of which he seems to know perfectly; and not only does he urge original arguments in favor of the claim, but he undertakes in advance to anticipate the arguments which might be urged, and which he supposed would be urged against him.

Now, I am not here a volunteer in this discussion. The House will do me the justice to recollect that I exhibited no disposition to take part in this controversy. The gentleman from Connecticut comes forward as a volunteer, and so exceedingly belligerent and martial is his disposition, that he constrains me to offer such information to the House as I might possess, and then complains that I have come here to make opposition to this claim. Sir, I have made no opposition to the claim. I have exhibited no purpose to oppose it. I have said not a word in opposition to the views of the petitioners. So far from it, the very first thing I did—although myself opposed to the bill—was to suggest that it should be passed by, by general consent, in order that the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCKER,] who reported it, might have an opportunity of vindicating it.

But since the gentleman from Connecticut seems to suppose that it is the duty of the chairman of the committee to give such information to the House as may be in his possession, and as perhaps it is a reasonable expectation that he should do so, I will say that the claim is one which, after examination, I cannot give my support to.

The committee are already aware that this claim originated very early in the revolutionary war. This man, James Jackson, having boarded the vessel commanded by Paul Jones, became, of course, a prisoner of war. He was detained as a prisoner of war, and his services as a pilot were demanded by Paul Jones. During an engagement that soon afterwards ensued, he had the misfortune to lose an arm, and Paul Jones then, sympathizing with his position, made him a gratuity of one hundred ducats, and gave him a paper by which he promised that Jackson should receive during his lifetime a pension from the United States.

Well, Jackson lost no time in preferring his claim against the United States. The demand was made against the Continental Congress, before the adoption of the present Constitution. There was, it is said, a favorable report made by the committee to whom that claim was referred; but certain it is, that Congress did not grant the claim. They had then as ample materials for investigating its merits as we can possibly have at this time; but the claim was not allowed.

It was subsequently renewed. In the year 1836, an application was made to the Congress of the United States to redeem the promise made by Paul Jones, and an adverse report was made from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which the petition had been referred. I have that report here, but I do not deem it necessary to have it read. In the year 1842, the petition was again preferred, and a report was made from the Committee on Naval Affairs, rejecting the claim. I will send that report to the Clerk to be read.

The CLERK read the report, as follows:

That this case has been reported on by various committees unfavorably. In 1841, it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, who made the following report:

"Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James Jackson, reported:

"That they find, among the papers submitted to them, a petition purporting to be the petition of James Jackson, of England, setting forth that his father, John Jackson, while a resident in England, was decoyed on board the American ship Bon Homme Richard, by Commodore John Paul Jones, in 1779, and compelled to serve as a pilot on board that ship; that he was in the action with the Serapis and Countess of Scarborough, and in that action had his arm shot off, and was otherwise wounded; and that Commodore Jones then promised him that Congress would pay him $300, and give him a suitable pension for life, and gave him a certificate to that effect. That, for certain causes, his father never applied to Congress for the fulfillment of the promise contained in this certificate; but after his father's death, he, the petitioner, with his brother and sister, delivered this original certificate to Richard Toltie, Esq., Vice Consul of the United States at Kingston-upon-Hull, in Great Britain, who placed the papers in the hands of William Davy, Esq., then Consul of the United States for Kingston-upon-Hull, for the purpose of forwarding them to the President of the United States, with such request as might be proper in the case. The petitioner claims the $300 and the amount of pension to which his father would have been entitled for his life. This petition is not even signed by the petitioner, and is no otherwise verified but by a certificate of Richard Toltie, the Vice Consul referred to in the petition, who confirms, generally, the facts stated in the petition; but the certificate of Commodore Jones, referred to in the petition, is not produced, nor is there any reason assigned why it is not produced.

"It does not appear when John Jackson died, but it must have been a short time previous to the 17th April, 1834, when the papers were delivered to the Vice Consul.

"No reason is assigned why John Jackson did not make the application in his lifetime. He must have been an old man, and the petitioner, James Jackson, was between forty and fifty years of age before his father's death.

"The committee are of opinion that the testimony in the case is entirely too loose and unsatisfactory to make it their duty even to inquire whether the petitioner would be entitled to relief if his case was made out in point of fact."

Since this report was made, the certificate of Commodore Jones has been found, by which it appears that there was no promise to pay John Jackson $300, as alleged by the memorialist, nor is the fact stated by him that the said John Jackson was paid 100 ducats by Commodore Jones. Neither is it a fact that John Jackson was decoyed on board the Bon Homme Richard, but he boarded her in consequence of his own mistake, supposing her to be a British ship. There was, however, a promise by Commodore Jones to pay him a pension; and, in 1785, the subject was brought before Congress, but there has been no action upon it. The claim of debt for the $300 not existing, and the pension not having been allowed by the United States, the committee, without going into the question how far a right would have accrued to the memorialist had the promise of Commodore Jones been recognized by Congress, do not discover any ground upon which a claim can be made by the petitioner.

Mr. MILLSON, (resuming.) I have now, in compliance with the request of the gentleman from Connecticut, given to the House all the information which I possess in reference to this case. I have not attempted to argue it. I have simply laid before the House such facts as I was informed of.

Now, I do not know why this claim was not allowed by the Continental Congress. There is, however, very strong reasons for the conclusion that they had some information at that day which we do not possess now.

[Here a message was received from the President of the United States, by M. P. FILLMORE, Esq., his Private Secretary.]

Mr. M. continued: Whilst I was ready at all times to answer any questions that might be put to me, I had no disposition to take part in this debate. I did not intend to do so until I was absolutely compelled to say what I have said, by the request of the gentleman from Connecticut.

This much, however, I will say, in conclusion, in reference, not only to this case, but to all the cases which come before this House. I have long thought that no claim should be allowed by the Congress of the United States, unless it was so well established as to preclude every reasonable doubt. Remember that these petitioners who come, seeking the aid of Congressional legislation, select their own evidence; they take the affidavits of such witnesses only as will forward their demands; and they take very good care not to seek evidence in those quarters where its effect would be disadvantageous, and the United States have no privilege of cross-examination. The case is wholly and strictly ex parte. The very shaping of the affidavits themselves is left to the petitioner or his counsel, and it may very well happen that a witness is made to say what he never intended to say, by the adoption of a particular phraseology in rehearsing his testimony. The applicant is not barred by any rejection of his claim. He has the privilege of coming again and again and asking that relief which may have been twenty times denied. If with all these advantages—the advantage of selecting his own opportunity of presenting the claim, the right to select his own witnesses, exemption from the embarrassment of a cross-examination, the privilege of giving body and form to his own testimony, and the right to repeat his demand after twenty rejections of his claim—if, I say, with all these advantages, he is not enabled to establish his claim to the satisfaction of the House, and without a reasonable doubt, then it does seem to me that the House should refuse the relief which is sought.

My opinion has been asked about this claim, and therefore I will say, without giving any of the reasons suggested by that opinion, that I am not satisfied of the justice of the claim, and that it was my intention to have given a silent vote against the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to the merits of this claim at all. But the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] requested, that whoever made the motion to lay this bill aside with a recommendation that it do not pass, would withdraw that motion. I made that motion, and I wish to say to the gentleman from Connecticut, that I cannot withdraw it, and I will give him the reasons very briefly.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the argument of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCKER] who made the report in this case, and who seemed deeply interested in getting the committee to pass the bill, but there was nothing in that argument, or in the evidence adduced, which went to convince me that this man is the heir of John Jackson at all. After having investigated the case as far as I was able, I have come to the conclusion, that this claimant has never established the slightest right to receive one dollar at our hands.

That is the reason why I made the motion, that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass. I hope that motion will prevail. At all events, I shall not withdraw it.

Mr. BOWIE. I ask that the bill may again be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BOWIE. If I correctly understood the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON], and the honorable gentleman from Ohio who has just taken his seat, the most serious objection urged by them to this bill, is a doubt as to the true character of the parties now petitioning for relief.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland, that although that is one objection with me—and an insurmountable one—to the allowance of this claim, I have other very great objections to it.

Mr. BOWIE. I address myself now to the objections which have been urged upon this floor, as to the reality of the heirs petitioning for relief.

If gentlemen have attended to the reading of the bill, they will observe that it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay this money to the legal heirs of John Jackson. Now, I apprehend it will be incumbent upon the Secretary of the Treasury, if this bill passes—

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman allow me a word of explanation?

Mr. BOWIE. Certainly.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not mean to be understood as saying that the principal objection I have to the bill is, that there is not sufficient proof that the present claimant is the heir of John Jackson. In response to an inquiry of the gentleman from Connecticut, I said that I did not feel satisfied of that proof; but I never said that was the only objection I had to the bill. I recollect that in committee, with a view to obviate that possible objection, it was agreed that the money should be payable—if paid at all—to the legal representatives of this man.

Mr. BOWIE. Supposing that objection to have weighed with other members of the House, as it certainly did with me, I will ask the indulgence of the committee for a few moments while I advert to it.

It is certainly clear, from the language of the bill, that it will become incumbent upon the Secretary of the Treasury, if this bill passes, to take every legal precaution to ascertain who are the heirs of John Jackson. If such proof as the common law requires to establish the existence of that heirship is not submitted to him, the Treasury will never have to pay this claim.

Putting out of view, then, this objection, which I think is sufficiently answered by the brief remarks I have made, it seems to me that there never was a stronger appeal to the sense of justice of this House than is now made to it. Here is a person who was one of the first victims of the Revolution on the sea—a man exhibiting to this House the bond of the nation written in the blood of its first victories, and asking that the faith of the nation, pledged under those solemn circumstances, shall be redeemed.

What answer can you give? Gentleman say there is not sufficient evidence—they say the claim is a stale one. Those gentlemen have forgotten that it comes here indorsed by the Congress of 1785. They have forgotten that the claim presents on its face the certificates of members of Congress in the year 1785. It is a claim, not only for the loss of an arm—for premature mutilation—but it is a claim for saving the lives of twenty sailors of the ship of war Bon Homme Richard. If gentlemen will turn to the report, they will find it stated that—

“It further appears to your committee, from a letter of Captain Jones, that the second lieutenant of the Bon Homme Richard was, with twenty others, at the time of the battle with the Serapis, on board Jackson's pilot boat, and that when Captain Jones found it impossible to prevent the Bon Homme Richard from sinking, Jackson's pilot boat was of singular service in saving the men, particularly the wounded, some of whom, Captain Jones is persuaded, would have been drowned had not he been furnished with the means of saving them.”

Here is the most conclusive proof that the lives of twenty seamen who first embarked in the war of the Revolution, and who were subjected to all the hazards of that war—that twenty men were saved through the agency of this man, and that he not only saved them, but reduced himself to want by the hazards which he involuntarily incurred.

Gentlemen tell us that he is entitled to no merit because he was an Englishman—because he was a subject of the British Government. Mr. Chairman, has the British Government acted upon that principle towards us? Have they refused to pay the claims of an American citizen because he was a descendant of one who rebelled against them? Nay, are we not witnessing day after day the most honorable exhibition upon the part of that Government—of the payment of claims to the heirs of those who emigrated to this country half a century ago? I think we may well be instructed by our enemies, if we are to regard the British nation as our enemy. Let us at least follow their example in meting out justice in regard to this claim. It is not a stale claim, and it is not, in my judgment, a doubtful one. It has received the sanction of the men of the Revolution—men who were acquainted with all the circumstances of the case. It is not, as has been said, involved in the suspicion that it has never been asserted in the lifetime of the claimant. Gentlemen are mistaken when they suppose so. It is true that there is no evidence that the claimant, in his lifetime, came to the doors of our predecessors—came to the doors of Congress and invoked relief. No, the Government of that day did not require that a petition should be presented. The Minister of Foreign Affairs then called the attention of Congress to the payment of this debt. Our records establish this fact beyond all doubt. Then it was considered of sufficient dignity and importance to require the first officer of the Government to call the attention of Congress to this claim. But now no claim can be established in Congress without not only being indorsed by the Government, but it must also be sustained by political influence. Now I hope gentlemen will take some interest in this claim. I hope they will set an example of their determination to examine private claims and to sustain them whenever they are found to be well founded.

I beg leave to advert for a moment to an important idea thrown out by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON], that we should not grant any claim presented here, unless it is established beyond all doubt, because the testimony is ex parte. Whose fault, I ask, is that? Has this Government established any tribunal in which examination on both sides can be had? Have not the people of the United States, time after time, invoked this House to establish a commission of claims by which the rights of the Government would be protected? How can the evidence be otherwise than ex parte, under the present circumstances, in the establishment of a claim? Surely, then, that which is a political necessity, should not be raised as an objection against this claim. Let the Government establish a tribunal, and let it throw open the doors of justice. Let it establish the ordinary means of proof, or not exclude petitioners who have not established their claims by unquestionable evidence. Do not let us, who are the representatives of the people, throw that blame upon our constituents who are asking justice at the hands of the powers that be.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the gentleman allow me to state one fact before the question is taken? I desire to ask if this claim has not been examined thoroughly both in this Hall and at the other end of the Capitol? I learn that a bill relating to this case was passed by both Houses, and that it was lost on its way from this House to the President's House.

[Cries of “Question!” “Question!”]

Mr. CLEVELAND. When gentlemen reproach others with not becoming acquainted with reports until the cases to which they refer come up here for action, I must beg to refer them to the fact, that this House was organized in the appointment of its committees with reference to the opinions of members, and not their merits; hence gentlemen should not come here and reproach those who were not quite as fortunate as themselves, if it be fortunate, in being selected as one of the favored few. It is certainly, in my judgment, not becoming gentlemen occupying those posts, under such circumstances, to reproach others because they take part in the business of the House for which they are in part responsible.

Mr. DANIEL. I rise to a question of order. I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] has already spoken two or three times upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. No other gentleman claimed the floor, and therefore it was in order for the gentleman from Connecticut to speak. If any other gentleman had claimed the floor, the Chair would not have awarded it to that gentleman.

Mr. CLEVELAND, (continuing.) My only wish was to elicit from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] an opinion; and I certainly meant to do it in the kindest manner, having no feelings towards that gentleman but those of the utmost kindness. But I say, in regard to this matter, that when the report was read, and the letters were read by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. GOODENOW,] it appeared to me that it was one of those cases which deserved the favorable consideration of the House, but which, against all equity, against all justice, was in danger of being defeated; and that was the reason why I interposed to say anything upon the subject.

Now, I ask, and I hope gentlemen will answer me candidly, whether they would hesitate one moment to vote a man a pension who had suffered in the late war with Mexico precisely in the manner this man did, in the war of the Revolution? Sir, that man does not have the honor of holding a seat upon this floor, who would have voted against it. I do not hesitate to say, that if a man had suffered in one of our ships during the Mexican war, as this claimant suffered, there is not a man upon this floor who would have resisted a claim for his relief. Is it not proper for us, in this case to inquire whether anything has been done in regard to this matter; or whether there is anything concerning it which should place this applicant in a worse condition than if the events to which the claim relates had occurred more recently? Let us look at the matter for a moment. Has there been any consideration paid to this man for being compelled to serve against his country, and to suffer as he did in the service of our country? Has this country ever rewarded this important service, thus forced from a man who was under no obligation to serve us? I answer, No, never! Is it a stale claim, which has never been presented here? So far from this, the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions—the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON]—admits that it was presented early, and that it has been pursued down to the present time. When the gentleman from Virginia presented that information I could not help thinking that by the time the State of Virginia gets her $120,000, which she is now petitioning Congress for, that she would meet with about as many difficulties as we have met with in endeavoring to do justice to this unfortunate man—I mean the claim which the State of Virginia has before this House, of about the same age, of $120,000, to be paid out of the public Treasury, for money which she advanced towards the completion of this Capitol. A report has been made against it in the Senate. I am inclined to believe that report is wrong. I only mention it for the purpose of illustration.

Mr. MILLSON, (interrupting.) Does the gentleman know that I am in favor of that claim?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Certainly not. I am only showing that this is not the only stale claim before the Congress of the United States. That is all. I do not know whether the gentleman from Virginia is in favor of it or against it; I only know that such a claim is here. I ask if, from the time this man first presented his claim down to the present day, there has been any abandonment of it by himself or his heirs? I answer no. Have we ever paid one cent towards that claim? I answer no. I then put this question to the House: Are we under obligations—honorable obligations—to pay him for his sufferings or to pay it to his children? Is it a good answer to say that because he is dead, his heirs shall not have what was due to him, in his lifetime? That would be a strange doctrine. If we have failed to pay to a man in his lifetime what was rightfully due him, justice requires that we should pay it to his legal heirs after his death. If gentlemen will examine into this matter, they will find that this man performed important service for us, and in so doing suffered the loss of an arm; now he comes forward by his heirs and claims his just reward which has never been paid him; and the question arises, whether we will take advantage of the length of time which has elapsed since his service was rendered and say we will not pay it? I am told that a favorable report was made in this case some fifteen or twenty years ago. I have sent for that report.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the gentleman that I was mistaken when I stated that fact. I find upon examination that it was a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Paul Jones to which I referred.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I had some doubts about the matter. But whether a favorable report has been made on it or not, makes no difference—whether a former Congress has rejected the claim or allowed it makes no difference with me.

There is a disposition to disregard the just claims of individuals presented here; there is an indisposition to give them that careful attention which they should receive at the hands of a tribunal, the only one upon earth before which they can prefer claims of this character against the Government. But when this argument is used, it seems to me it is adding insult to former injustice. How many are there who take the trouble to inform themselves in regard to these claims? Very few. What is the general feeling? It is this: Away with the claim; some speculator has got hold of it, and we will vote against it. This bugbear—I use the word intentionally—this bugbear, that agents and speculators are going to reap the benefits, has prevented a large number of honest claims from receiving that consideration which they are entitled to. As to this bill, I never heard of it until this morning, but it is not for me to stop my ears and shut my eyes, and refuse to do my duty in regard to a petitioner, merely because some one whispers in my ear, or whispers about the House, that an agent is doing something wrong about it. In that way an honest man has no better chance than a knave. It is our duty, permit me to say—and I say it very respectfully to the House—to give these private claimants a fair and impartial hearing; and if we find that they have merits in their claims, let us never offer as an apology for the tardy justice we are called upon now to render, that they have been rejected and rejected, until they have wasted more, in coming here to ask justice at our hands, than the original claim was worth. I know of many such instances, where men, with as legal, just, and righteous claims against the Government as ever man had against his fellow-man, were delayed, and delayed, until they had expended more money in asking justice of Congress, who ought, willingly and promptly to have done justice to them, than the original claim amounted to. I have no fear of the cry that I am disposed to be extravagant. I am disposed to be just, and make this Government pay its honest debts. I am the last man living who will consent, as one of the two hundred and thirty-three triers here, to crush a private individual and his claim, because Government can do it with impunity. It is a system of dishonesty to which I never intend to become a party. But when I make that remark, I do not intend to reflect upon any member of this House. I mean to say that I fear we are too inconsiderate and regardless of the rights of individuals, merely because they are individuals. But, sir, let any question arise touching the claim or prospects of any presidential aspirant who could, if elected, return favors for favors granted, how ready we should be, how eager every member would be to inform and commit himself in favor of the individual, because there might then be a return. Sir, the selfishness which induces members to sacrifice the rights of honest claimants for the purpose of gaining popularity as economists, or from carelessness and inattention, deserves to be rebuked, and so far as my voice and vote will accomplish that object, it shall be done.

Mr. AVERETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate, but to protest against its protraction. I have no doubt that the committee have been ready to vote upon this case for the last hour. I desire prompt and faithful attention to the bills on the Calendar. But, if the time allotted to their consideration is to be consumed by such lectures as we have just heard, just claims will be defeated, and new arguments furnished to those who desire the establishment of a new department of Government, to facilitate the getting of money from the Treasury. We need no such new wheel to be added to the already too complicated machinery of Government. If we fail to do justice to claimants, it is not because we cannot, but because we will not.

Mr. HOWARD. It appears to me that this claim had its origin in clear legal liabilities. What were they? A British subject was taken a prisoner upon an American man-of-war, and is compelled to serve in an action against his own Government. Now this is contrary to the law of nations, and the law of war. John Paul Jones understood that law when he gave that certificate. He knew what he was about when he promised to pay that man half pay for life as pilot. He knew that in compelling that man to serve against his own country, he had violated the laws of nations, and the laws of war, and he endeavored to make him the only compensation in his power, which was a pecuniary one. Now, there is no objection in this world against this claim, except its age, and this Government is clearly bound to make him an equitable compensation for the injury which was done to him, in violation of the laws of war and of nations. That is the origin and foundation of this claim; and when this certificate was given to him by John Paul Jones, at the time, it was clearly felt to be a legal obligation, and one which an individual has a right to claim of a nation, at whose hands he suffers wrong by a violation of public law. This seems to me too clear for argument. This claim has never been paid. It ought to be paid to some one, and it is one which goes to the heirs of Mr. Jackson, whoever they may be.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]
Mr. WALBRIDGE. I do not intend to inflict a speech upon the committee at this time. I wish to call its attention to a few facts; and if they are satisfactorily established, this claim ought to be allowed.

The first fact is this: Are the committee satisfied that John Paul Jones gave the certificate set out in the report in this case? I understand that it is proved. If that fact is established, and satisfactorily to this House, it seems to me it establishes the claim, and that we ought to make remuneration to the heirs of this man. The second fact, whether the heirs of this man are to be benefited by this claim. Now, upon that point, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] has fully answered the objection which has been made. It will be the duty of the Secretary, by the provisions of this act, as it is here presented, to allow this claim only when the proof of that fact shall be adduced before him. Now, as regards this claim, if the members of the committee are satisfied that John Paul Jones gave the certificate, it seems to me that it is a just and righteous one, and one to which this Congress ought to respond. But, in relation to the other fact, certainly there can no question be raised here in reference to it.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to consider the view of the question as taken by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] that it was a violation of the rules of war and of the laws of nations. A singular contrast to the conduct in that action—though it resulted in the necessity of the case—is presented in the battle between the Constitution and Guerrier, an account of which we have lately heard from a prisoner of war on board the Guerrier. As the Constitution approached, and its American character was ascertained, this prisoner made an appeal to the commander, Dacres, whether he should remain upon deck. The commander replied, "No, sir; I have no right to keep you in such a position. Go below." I trust we shall have something like a disposition to imitate the English in that particular. Now, there can be no doubt but that this man was entitled to indemnity. Suppose that under this pressure of war we had seized his goods and chattels, and taken away those important means of his livelihood, would he not be entitled to compensation? I do not rise, however, to present even this view, and I do not mean to detain the committee long, but I rise to object to this plea of the statute of limitation. I object to it in principle. I object to it because there are too many men in this nation who will follow the example of the Government; and I hope this House will look not only to its own dignity, not only to what is right, but to the rights of parties who come before them as claimants; and that it will, in relation to a great public example, set their face against the plea. And I will say in addition, that where the Government has thought proper to rely upon the lapse of time as a means of defence against claims, they have provided for it in their statutes.

Now let me further say, that of all the things in the world the plea of the statute of limitations against revolutionary claims is the most deficient of merit. Something has been said of the Continental Congress. Why, did they pay all their responsibilities? Are we to be told at this time that the Government has faithfully discharged all its duties, and paid all the claims against it? If we introduce the plea of limitation upon a case where the first of the actors in the scene was most competent to decide upon it, I ask you what is to become of the claim of the representative of Baron De Kalb, and of those of a host behind who are to come in and claim this amount out of the public Treasury, not as a pension, but as a debt which they are entitled to just as much as if their ancestors had earned so much by the sweat of their brow, and it had been wrongfully taken from their hands by the action of the Government? And what is to become of that class of claims, founded upon the promise of Washington? There is a remarkable entry in that valuable publication—the accounts of that illustrious man kept during the revolutionary war—and he leaves this legacy, and puts it in a note, upon one of its pages, that he has received assistances from the members of parties on both sides of the line, in regard to his revolutionary efforts. That they have assisted him in the various stages of his struggles, and commends them to the benevolence and justice of the Government. He uses this remarkable language: "Whenever they are presented I trust to my country, or to the councils of my country, to pay them." I give the substance of his language, not his phraseology. Will we repudiate the faith of Washington? If this claim had come backed by Washington's promise—a promise of the description referred to—would we have had the spirit to set up repudiation, or the statute of limitation? I imagine not. And shall we not say—though not so holy as the word of Washington—that there is something in the faith of John Paul Jones, pledged as it was under the solemnities of that action, that entitles his word to be considered, regarded, and enforced at the hands of the American Congress?

The question then recurring upon the motion to lay the bill aside, with a recommendation that it do not pass—

Mr. CHANDLER demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and POLK were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 77.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GUSTAVUS A. DE RUSSY.

The committee next proceeded to the consideration of bill No. 96—a bill for the relief of Gustavus A. De Russey, late an acting purser in the Navy.

The reading of the report being called for, it was read by the Clerk.

Mr. DANIEL. It will be seen that this bill proposes not only to allow the difference between what pursers were receiving when this clerk was first appointed and the compensation of a purser under the act of 1842, but the interest upon that money. I can see no reason why the interest should be allowed in this case. I do not know when this case was first presented for adjustment; I move, therefore, to strike out "$514 14," and in its stead to insert "$362." That is the principal exclusive of the interest.

Mr. BOCKOCK. The report which has just been read at the Clerk's desk was drawn by myself as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I thought it was proper and just to allow this man interest upon the money claimed. I do not see what ground the gentleman from North Carolina assumes when he contends that interest ought not to be allowed. Does the gentleman mean to say to this House that interest ought never to be paid by this Government upon a debt that it owes to an individual? Does the gentleman mean to take any such ground as that? Where there is a clear, ascertained, balance due a man for services rendered, does he rise upon this floor, and say, if the Government does not choose to pay that debt, but holds the man out of it year after year, that when at length it does make payment, it ought not to pay the interest? If the gentleman means to take any such ground as that, I say for one, that I dissent from it, and appeal to the House to say whether it is not an improper ground. I put the claim of this man, in the report which has just been read, upon legal grounds. I say that he had a right to demand this money. I say, furthermore, that the highest officers of the Department decide that he had a right to demand it, but the accounting office refuses to give it. The legal ground was this: A law was passed here some time, I think, in the course of the summer of 1842, changing the pay of pursers.

It may be proper to state here, that the gentleman from North Carolina himself concedes that this man was entitled to the pay of a purser, just as if he was legally appointed purser for the time he was performing these services. Then, that being conceded, come to the other point. A law was passed during the summer of 1842 changing and increasing the pay of pursers. There was a provision in that law that it should go into operation as to the persons in the home squadron from the time of its passage, and to all persons abroad from the commencement of the first quarter after proclamation thereof shall be made. Now, some time in the month of December of the year 1842, the commander of the squadron received intelligence of the passage of the law, and he made proclamation from the Commodore's flag-ship. That proclamation the officers say applies to the whole squadron under his command. Informal notice was carried to this ship, which had been detailed to cruise on the African coast. The man himself did not receive formal notice of it, but the Commodore had received notice, and had made proclamation from the flag-ship, which was a notice to the whole squadron. Well, if this is so, it entitled him to his pay under the new law. The new law had been passed months before. He came here and he claimed pay under the new law. The Second Auditor, the accounting officer, refused to allow it. He then appealed to Commodore Warrington, who said that he was entitled to it; but the Second Auditor still refused to allow it. He then appealed to Judge Mason, Secretary of the Navy, and he said that he was legally entitled to it, but the Second Auditor still refused, and he now comes before the House. Now, the position I take is, that it ought to have been paid him at the time; that he had a right to it, and that it was a just and legal demand; and that it being a sum for which he had had a legal right to make demand, that interest ought to be paid upon it from the day on which it ought to have been paid to him. The difficult and responsible services this man had to perform upon the barren and desolate coast of Africa, the responsibility upon his hands, are all set forth in the report, and I shall not detain the House with the details again. In my judgment the interest ought to be paid.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not intend to place myself, by the motion I have made, upon new ground in reference to this matter. It is a well-established principle, that the Government, as a general rule, does not pay interest. I think it is generally a correct one; for if it was the universal rule that interest shall be paid to the time when Congress shall, after a lapse of years, ascertain a demand to have been a good one, it would become a most convenient mode of funding all demands against the Government, and individuals, instead of presenting their claims promptly at the proper departments for adjudication, would have all the motives of capitalists to withhold them. Claims are sometimes kept back in consequence of the imperfect manner in which proof is presented, and sometimes in consequence of delays arising on the part of the applicants themselves.

Mr. BOCKOCK. If my friend from North Carolina will permit me. Not a single one of the reasons assigned applies to this case.

Mr. DANIEL. Wait until I have got to the others. I have not got through yet. There is nothing stated in the report which takes it out of the application of that rule upon which the Government has acted in the non-payment of interest. If there is any special reason, the gentleman has neglected to give it in his report. I do not gather from any statement the gentleman has made, or anything in the case that ought, to take it out of the operation of that general rule; on the contrary, I can see reasons in addition to that glanced at by my motion for its application. The gentleman predicates this legal liability upon the ground that unequivocal notice was given in conformity with the laws of 1842 to this officer. There is just ground for exception to that position. I will not say that the gentleman is not correct, but there is certainly some reason to doubt it. The words of the law have been quoted in the report, as I suppose, correctly, by the gentleman. The act was to go into effect in the United States from the date of its passage, and in vessels abroad at the beginning of the quarter after its official notification.

The commander of the squadron in this case received notice of the passage of the act of the first of January, 1843. He then made his proclamation. His vessel was not present, as she was cruising elsewhere—cruising upon the coast of Africa—and the question is, whether, according to the provisions of this act, he received that notice which the act intended to make necessary to give operation to the law, until it was actually notified on board of the vessel.

[Here a message was received from the Senate, by the hands of their Secretary, ASBURY DICKINS, Esq.]

Mr. DANIEL resumed. It is certainly true, that the act was not literally complied with until the notice was actually received on board of the vessel in which this purser, formerly a clerk, belonged. It may well be contended, therefore, that his pay could not arise until after he received notice. There being some doubt about the construction which the gentleman claims as the construction of the act, and seeing no sufficient reason why the general rule should be departed from, I have made the motion I submit, and think it ought to prevail. Unless we are disposed to pay interest in every case—unless we are disposed to adopt that rule and change the general rule, why we should do it.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I had wished to say nothing more. I am opposed as much as any member upon this floor, to speaking upon these matters at all. I have given practical evidence of that fact in my course here, but I will say one or two words in reply to the position just taken by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL.] The gentleman says, the general principle upon which this Government acts, is, that it will not pay interest. I understand it to be based upon the reason, that the Government of the United States holds itself at all times ready to pay its debts, when presented, that the debt has never been presented in a legal form—in a form in which the proof had been conclusive, until the time when the amount is to be voted. Now, I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina, if a claim comes up for unliquidated damages—if a claim comes up for a pension—if a claim comes up resting upon anything of that sort, it ought not to carry interest until the proof is completed. This is the ground which the gentleman from North Carolina assumes—this is the reason upon which his principles rest, as applied in this case. De Russey actually made a demand upon the Government for this sum. He actually claimed it from the Department. His proof was as full and as conclusive then as it is at this instant of time. If we owe it now, we owed it then. If we ought to pay it now, we ought to have paid it then. Shall we profit by our own failure to do our duty to ourselves?

Mr. DANIEL. Why was it not paid?

Mr. BOCKOCK. I have already stated that the accounting officer, the Second Auditor, took the view which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] has suggested, as to the construction of this law—and held that the law should not go into operation as to vessels abroad, until actual notification should be made.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one more question? If we pay interest upon these cases, why not pay interest upon every deferred salary?

Mr. BOCKOCK. If we hold back from a man the salary to which he is entitled by the law, I say we ought to pay interest. We ought to be just, and we ought to pay the just demands upon us. When we refuse to pay where a demand is clearly made out, then we ought not to profit by our own refusal to do our duty. The gentleman from North Carolina argues in relation to this matter, as if the language of the law was an actual notification. That is not the language. It says official notification; and the laws of this country, and those highest in authority, have decided that to make notification of the law of this sort for a squadron, it has only to be proclaimed by the commanders of the squadrons. If it is true that a proclamation by the commodore of a ship is an official notification for the squadron, this man was entitled to his demand, and he ought to have it. If it was a debt we owed—if it was a debt the amount of which, and the proof of which was before the Department at the time the Department improperly refused to pay it, I say that now, in my opinion, we ought to pay interest upon it.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DANIEL's amendment; and there were—ayes 63—nays 52.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, (Messrs. FOWLER, of Massachusetts, and HENDRICKS, acting as tellers,) and resulted—ayes 65—nays 51.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ORR moved that the bill be laid aside, and reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. ORR, the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee [Mr. DISNEY] reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration two bills, which they had directed him to report back, one with an amendment and one without amendment, with a recommendation that they do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill to the House.

Mr. ORR moved, that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DUNCAN called for the yeas and nays.

[Cries of "Oh no; withdraw the call!"]

The SPEAKER announced that there were only seventeen rising—believed not to be a sufficient number.

Mr. GIDDINGS insisted on a count; and the negative side being counted, there were 116.

Mr. GIDDINGS demanded tellers on ordering the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

And the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. ORR's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the House will not adjourn until the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House have been disposed of.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was then taken on Mr. STEPHENS's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the House adjourned till Monday.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. GEYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Robert Milligan, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to authorize the sale of reserved lands and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Edward Hott, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to release from reservation and to return to the mass of public lands certain lands in the State of Alabama; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the petition of Mark Bean and Richard H. Bean, of Arkansas, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief, which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill entitled "An act to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," as amended by the House of Representatives, reported it back, with a recommendation that the Senate do not agree to the said amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD subsequently rose and said: I ask the Senate to take up the bill in regard to the assignability of land warrants, and dispose of the amendments with which it has come from the House of Representatives. If the Senate shall insist on the amendments which were made before the bill was returned to the House, it may possibly lead to a committee of conference, and the sooner that takes place the better. I therefore hope the bill may be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. PRATT. I would prefer that that bill should lie over until to-morrow. I have received a petition upon the subject, and I wish to examine the amendments and see whether the prayer of the petitioners can be granted.

Mr. BADGER. I would like to understand from some gentleman familiar with the subject, whether or not the effect of the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives is or is not to strike out from the bill everything except the provision which makes land warrants assignable?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. BADGER. Then I hope my friend from Maryland will not object to the consideration of the bill at this time. I can see no necessity for delay.

Mr. PRATT. If the Senate dissent from the amendments of the House, the effect of it would be to place the bill in such a position that it could not be amended here. My object is, if it be in order, to introduce such an amendment as would meet the prayer of the petitioners to whom I have referred.

Mr. BADGER. That cannot be done.

Mr. PRATT. If it cannot be done, I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDENT. If there is any objection, the bill cannot be taken up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the gentleman will allow the bill to be taken up.

Mr. PRATT. Let it lie over.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

KENTUCKY DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to extend the time for selling the lands granted to the Kentucky Asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb, reported it back without amendment.

As the time specified in the bill making the grant will soon expire, he requested the Senate to act upon it at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to allow five years in addition to the five years heretofore allowed, for the sale of the lands which have been granted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would state, that a letter which I have received from the President of the institution, informs me that the time granted for the sale of these lands will expire in May next; and a further extension of time is asked. Most of the lands have been sold, and there are only a few tracts remaining.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. GEYER gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for holding an additional term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey the right of way to the Cleveland and Pittsburg, and Cleveland, Painesville, and Ashtabula Railroad Companies, through certain lands therein mentioned; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FISH, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill amending an act approved the 22d of February, 1847, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. M. P. Fillmore, his Secretary, transmitting a report from the Secretary of the Interior respecting the delay and difficulty in making the apportionment among the several States of the representatives in the 33d Congress, as required by the act of 23d May, 1850, in consequence of the want of full returns of the population of the State of California; and suggesting the necessity for remedial legislation.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER rose subsequently and inquired to what committee was that referred?

The PRESIDENT. To the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know whether that communication should properly be referred to that committee. As it relates to the apportionment, perhaps it should go to a special committee. There was a special committee on the census at the last Congress, but I suppose that committee was dissolved when it exhausted its functions.

Mr. GWIN. I think the Senator from South Carolina is right in desiring this communication to be referred to a select committee. If I understand this report, it will show an extraordinary state of affairs; that the census of one of the States of this Confederacy has not been taken at all, and that she is likely to be deprived of a member of Congress in consequence of that neglect. I think a select committee ought to be appointed to inquire why the census of the State of California has not been taken. I am opposed to this communication going to the Judiciary Committee, because I do not think it is a judicial question. I move to reconsider the vote referring it to that committee, and to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I am not tenacious about it at all; but as the communication contemplates an amendment to the general law upon a very important subject, I think it ought to receive the attention of the Judiciary Committee. But if the Senator from California feels, on behalf of his State, a special interest in the matter, I have no objection to concur with his motion. It strikes me, after all, however, that a question of such magnitude is properly referable to the Judiciary Committee.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

RESERVED LAND IN IOWA.

On the motion of Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to grant to the city of Burlington, in Iowa, the land heretofore reserved between that city and the Mississippi river.

It proposes to grant to the city of Burlington, in Iowa, the land bordering on the Mississippi in front of that city, reserved under the act of July 2, 1836, for a public highway, and other public uses, together with the accretions which may have been formed in the front thereof, to be disposed of in such manner as the corporate authorities of that city may direct. The second section provides that on a duly authorized application a patent shall be issued for the land. The Committee on Public Lands propose to amend the bill by striking out the second section, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the grant made by this act shall operate as a relinquishment only of the right of the United States in and to said premises, and shall in no manner affect the rights of third persons therein, or to the use thereof, but shall be subject to the same; and on application by a duly authorized agent of the corporate authorities of said city to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a patent of relinquishment, according to the provisions of this act, shall be issued therefor, as in other cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I would request the Senator from Iowa to explain the object of that bill and the quantity of land it proposes on our part to relinquish.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I will state that there is not a single alternate section, or two dollars and a half clause connected with this bill. It simply provides that the accretions which have formed in front of the city of Burlington, because of a very large bend in the river at that place, shall be granted to the city. The lands reserved in front of the city, which are spoken of in the bill, were those laid off and reserved for public uses when the town was laid out in 1836. There is a very large bend in the Mississippi river opposite the city. There is a public improvement going on there, and the city, by certain works which it will prosecute, will run the landing very much beyond where it now is, by grading and leveling the hill's back and throwing the dirt in front. The city is to take care of the land, and the bill simply grants the lands which it may thus reclaim on the bend of the river.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. The Senator failed to answer one question which I propounded—the quantity of land which will be granted under this bill?

Mr. DODGE. I am unable to answer the question. I would state that the bend is perhaps half a mile long. It is, however, immaterial to this Government, for the Government laid off six hundred and forty acres, and gave the whole of it for public uses, such as making wharves, &c. The objects of the Government are in no way concerned by the bill. I do not know how far the landing may be extended out by the improvement, nor how much land will be granted by this bill. I understand, from a constituent and friend, who lives there and knows all about it, that it is to be extended eighty feet.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CHARLES A. GRIGNON.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Charles A. Grignon, was read a third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had directed a message to be sent to the Senate, requesting that a copy be furnished it of the resolution of the Senate to establish certain post routes, the said resolution having been lost or mislaid since its reference to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Iowa will allow the bill to establish a navy-yard in San Francisco to be taken up. I wish to make some remarks in reply to what the Senator from Pennsylvania said on Friday. I was then entitled to the floor on the bill, and it was, on my motion, postponed to this day.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. My honorable friend will recollect that he himself agreed, on Friday, when that bill was taken up, that it should not consume more than an hour or two.

Mr. GWIN. On that day.

Mr. JONES. He said he had no disposition to debate it himself, and that there would not be much debate upon it; but it is evident that it is to lead to very considerable debate. It was then agreed that this day should be set apart for the consideration of the bill which I have mentioned. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has had the floor upon it for some time. He commenced his speech, spoke for a few moments, and was compelled to postpone his remarks for other matters of minor importance. I hope the Senate will now take up that bill, that the Senator from Tennessee may proceed with his speech. I think the bill can be disposed of to-day, or at all events to-morrow or next day; and then I shall be very willing to assist the Senator from California in having his bill taken up and acted upon.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from California, that in my judgment, it would be better to let our friend from Iowa have his bill considered this morning. He has had exceedingly bad luck with it heretofore. The bill to which the Senator from California refers, will undoubtedly produce some discussion. I think it would be better to take up this bill and get through with it, and then we can take up the bill of the Senator from California.

Mr. GWIN. If I thought there was the slightest prospect of settling the question involved in the bill of the Senator from Iowa within a month, I would not oppose his motion; but I am perfectly confident that that bill will not be passed by this body within a month. The question involved in the bill which I propose to bring up, is a local one, and can soon be decided; but a dozen States are interested in the bill of the Senator from Iowa, and the whole policy of granting donations for the purposes of internal improvements is debated upon this bill. If I thought it would be passed within a month, I should not interpose any objection. As the bill of the Senator from Iowa is the first on the Calendar, I do not wish to put it out of its order, but I would like to have an opportunity for the consideration of my bill.

The motion of Mr. Jones was agreed to.

Mr. BELL resumed and concluded the speech which he commenced some days ago. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. HUNTER was next recognized by the Chair; but the usual hour of adjournment had arrived, and on his motion

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, February 16, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. Morgan.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. STUART. With the permission of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. NABERS,] who is entitled to the floor, I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. Last Monday, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] was upon the floor, in the act of asking the unanimous consent of the House to introduce certain resolutions, but was deprived of it by a question of privilege made by the gentleman from Kentucky, and acquiesced in by the House; but the gentleman from Mississippi not rising to-day, the gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STUART. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution as a report from the Committee on Territories:

"Resolved, That the third week in April next, or as much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, be set apart for the consideration of territorial business, and that during that time such business shall take precedence and be regarded as the special order."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to strike out the third week in April, and insert the first week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the rules of the House would have to be suspended before a special order could be made. Leave has been granted for the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS. I suppose that it is understood that all the rules are suspended.

The SPEAKER. Not if there is objection, in the opinion of the Chair. What motion did the gentleman from Georgia submit?

Mr. STEPHENS. My motion was to strike out "the third week," and insert "the first week;" but the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SIBLEY] urges me not to make the motion, and therefore I shall not do it. I was afraid that if postponed to the third week in April, the territorial business would be entirely neglected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It will be impossible for the Committee on Territories to submit all the propositions in relation to the Territories before the time designated in the resolution. The resolution was offered by the instructions of the committee.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

CASE OF PROSPER M. WETMORE.

Mr. ORR, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House whether the accounts of Prosper M. Wetmore, late Navy agent in the city of New York, as adjusted, show any defalcation on his part, and if so, when such defalcation was discovered, and the amount thereof; whether any, and if so what, steps have been taken to collect the amount which said Wetmore failed to pay over, and when proceedings were commenced, if at all, to collect said amount. Also, whether any compromise was at any time made between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Solicitor thereof and said Wetmore, or any arrangement entered into respecting such alleged defalcation, and if so, what was such compromise or arrangement, and whether the same has been complied with.

MILEAGE OF DELEGATE FROM OREGON.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill from the Committee on Mileage. I will state to the House, that it has been understood that the mileage compensation of the Delegate from Oregon has been regulated by the law of 1818, but the committee discover that the law organizing a territorial government for that Territory limits the compensation of the delegate to $2,500. The object of this bill is to repeal the clause containing that limitation. It is the only limitation upon the mileage of any delegate or member, and I hope there will be no objection to the introduction of the bill.

There being no objection,

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Mileage, then reported a bill to regulate the mileage of the Delegate from the Territory of Oregon; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. KING, of New York, called for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I should like to hear read that provision of the law which it is proposed to repeal. Has the gentleman from Indiana got it here?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, I have not got the provision here, but it is exceedingly brief. It reads, I think, "Provided, the mileage of said Delegate shall not exceed two thousand five hundred dollars."

Mr. STEPHENS. I think that a good limitation, and I am against its repeal.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that the report of the Committee may be read. It will perhaps remove any objection there may be to the passage of the bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Mileage have had under consideration the mileage compensation of the Delegate from Oregon, and find:

That by the law establishing the territorial government of Oregon, the mileage compensation of said Delegate is limited to $2,500. The committee believe, that, at the last session of Congress, it was understood that said limitation was not then in force, as the Delegate from said Territory was allowed, and did receive, mileage above that amount, but by what authority the committee are not able to learn. Similar provisions are found in the laws establishing the territorial governments of Utah and New Mexico, but they are inoperative, as the mileage of the Delegates from said Territories does not amount to that sum under the law of 1818, which regulates the pay and mileage of members of Congress and Delegates from Territories. At the second session of the Thirtieth Congress, the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon was regulated by the provision of the law above quoted. But at the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon, and of the Senators and Representatives from California, was regulated by an act passed at that session, entitled "An act to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for pay and mileage of members of Congress for the present session," approved September 20th, 1850. But that statute only operated during the session of Congress at which it was passed, and after that left the compensation of the Senators and Representatives from California to be regulated by the law of 1818, and that of the Delegate from Oregon to be regulated by the law organizing the territorial government above-mentioned.

"Since the enactment of the law regulating the compensation of members of Congress and Delegates from Territories, in 1818, exceptions to the rule of compensation, prescribed in said statute, have been made only in two instances. One was the law above-mentioned, which limited the mileage of the Senators and Representatives from California, and the Delegate from Oregon, for one session; and the other is the law above-mentioned, which limits the mileage compensation of the Delegate from Oregon to $2,500.

"The honorable Delegate from Oregon is the only gentleman, representing a State or Territory in either branch of Congress, whose compensation is thus limited. And the committee, though of the opinion that the law of 1818 ought to be amended, and perhaps a fixed limit established to the mileage compensation, think that while that law remains, no discrimination, to the prejudice of the Delegate from Oregon, ought to be made; but that his compensation should be regulated by the same law that regulates the compensation of other Representatives of States and Territories in Congress. The committee therefore report a bill, repealing that part of the law establishing the territorial government of Oregon which limits the compensation of said Delegate, as aforesaid."

Mr. WOODWARD. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Mileage whether the general law—I think the law of 1818—does not provide that in no instance shall the mileage exceed the per diem?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No; I think it makes no such limitation.

Mr. WOODWARD. My impression is that it does.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very positive that it does not.

Mr. FITCH. There is a provision of that kind in the law; but that provision has been evaded by Congress ever since its adoption. We ought not, in justice, to adopt any limitation that will operate upon one delegate or member on this floor and not upon others. There is a provision in the law organizing the Territory of Oregon, that the Delegate from that Territory shall not receive mileage exceeding $2,500. After the admission of California, there being no law applicable to the Representatives of that State, they of course drew their mileage under the general law of 1818, and they consequently draw much more mileage than the Delegate from Oregon can do, in consequence of the special law applicable to him. The object of the committee, I suppose, is to put them all on the same footing, by repealing the special law in relation to the Delegate from Oregon, and permitting him to draw what he would draw under the general law.

The general law is defective, but we ought not to remedy the defects of that law at the expense of one delegate or representative only. We should make it operative alike upon all.

Mr. WOODWARD. I am in favor of this bill for the very reason stated by the gentleman from Indiana. I am for limiting all mileage by the same law, and if there exists a provision in the general law applicable to all members, the special law for the Delegate from Oregon ought to be repealed.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Mileage. A bill has been introduced and referred to that committee which proposes to reform and regulate the mileage of all the members; I wish to inquire whether the committee have taken up that bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes. It has been under consideration before the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish, then, to inquire whether the committee propose action upon that bill, or whether they propose that this shall supersede action on that bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course the committee will report back the bill referred to them. What report they will make, I am not prepared to say, as the committee have not yet decided.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not desire to know how they will report; I merely desired to know whether they intend to take action on the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state further to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this bill has nothing whatever to do with that one.

Mr. FOWLER. I have no objection to the bill now before the House; but it occurred to me that if the whole subject of mileage was to come before us on the bill which has been referred to the committee, it would be more appropriate to defer action on this bill until we take up the whole subject. I have, however, no objection to the passage of this bill. I think, with the gentleman from Indiana, that there should be no discrimination made between members on this floor, but that the whole subject should be examined. I am fully persuaded that there should be a thorough system of reform.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I find that there has been no difference of opinion expressed in this House as to the merits of the proposition now before us. Every gentleman who has spoken on the subject seems to consider that the provision which this bill is intended to repeal makes an invidious and unjust distinction, operating against only one member of this House; and there is a disposition—judging from the remarks which have been made—to place that member upon a footing with the residue of the members, and to give him the same rights under the same law which governs the rights of all of us. I cannot see any necessity for going on with debate upon a proposition that seems to be so unanimously agreed upon, and I therefore ask for the previous question.

Mr. TOOMBS. We have had no opportunity to express our opposition yet.

Mr. CARTTER. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas to withdraw the demand for the previous question, to enable me to give an illustration of the want of unanimity in this body upon this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew his motion.

Mr. CARTTER. I feel, in common with the other gentlemen who have addressed the House, and in common with the sentiments of the report which has been read, the injustice of making a distinction between the Delegate from Oregon and the other gentlemen upon this floor who are in possession of the long miles. It is a matter of great injustice that the Delegate from the remotest Territory should be held down to a restriction which is overrun by those who live between him and the Capitol. But is this the remedy? I do not learn from the report, or from the argument of those who would sustain it, that $2,500 is not an adequate mileage from here to Oregon. It is not a question of justice between the Delegate from Oregon and the Government, but a question of comparative merit between him and other gentlemen who receive more mileage and are located nearer to the Capitol. I am in favor of reducing it to equality, but not in this way. The proposition coming from the Committee on Mileage proposes, instead of doing what the public have long called for, and what the sense of this House has often expressed a wish to see done—instead of bringing down this question of mileage to a question of merit, and reducing the members upon this floor to an equality of compensation, it proposes to take the very extreme of injustice, and advance the salary paid to that Delegate.

Now, I object to that. It is a poor nostrum, it appears to me, to remove the evident inequality in the pay of members here. The man who comes here from California is paid $2,500, or $4,000. His passage costs him $300. He consumes upon the way three weeks of time, if you please, more or less. Perhaps he does not return at all. He may, or may not, at his pleasure, but it is to be presumed he will, when he can.

But I would like to know where is the justice of paying one Representative from a distant portion of the Republic $6,000 for performing this three weeks' trip—a large portion of which might be a pleasure trip to most of us—while the man residing within three hundred miles of the Capitol is receiving nothing? No, sir; I hope that the bill reported from the Committee on Mileage will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that when it comes out of that committee it will provide for the equalization of the remuneration of members upon this floor. It is time that the distinction—which has been obliterated by steam and railroad conveyances—this distinction between the pay of one member upon this floor and another, should be ended; and instead of running into this extremity of enlarging the pay of the Delegate from Oregon, we had better begin at the other end, and go to shortening it. I will remark that this view of the subject acknowledges the grossest injustice. It says to the Delegate from Oregon, You shall receive but $2,500, although many of the members of Congress who come from a much shorter distance receive twice that amount. I go for an equality to all. But if you want to extend the mileage of members, you must bring the short-enders up, and not reduce the long-enders down. Let us have an equality in the matter. That is all I want.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is not with reference to this special case that I rise to make a suggestion at this time. The gentleman from Arkansas speaks of the unanimity which exists in relation to this matter among the members upon this floor. Now, I apprehend that unanimity will be found to be not in accordance with the position of that gentleman upon this question of mileage. At every session, for the last three or four years, the House have attempted to reduce and equalize the mileage of members. We have adopted propositions to that effect with great unanimity—the opposition scarcely exceeding fifty votes—but they have been defeated by the Senate. When the territorial bill for Oregon was under consideration before the House, $2,500 was considered a just maximum. It was so considered for the reason that all above the amount necessary to pay expenses becomes salary. Twenty-five hundred dollars is sufficient to pay all expenses of traveling, and then leave a salary above the average of the House. If you want to pay a salary in this manner, why pay it to everybody; it is very easy to get at it. There is no difficulty in it at all. One of the reasons urged for this discrimination is, that members from beyond the Rocky Mountains cannot go home during the session, or even in the recess, and thereby lose their business. This is true to some extent as to every part of the country; at least results in loss of business at home. And the inconvenience of not being able to go home in recess is equally true in reference to some other portions of the country. I think the member from Texas [Mr. HOWARD] found it extremely inconvenient to return—especially to attend to any matters of business—during the last short recess of sixty days; and I presume other gentlemen from the remote portions of the country found it equally inconvenient. Therefore I say that we ought not to establish this principle in the manner which this bill proposes. If we are to establish it at all, the Committee on Mileage ought to introduce a bill putting all the members upon the same footing with the gentleman from Oregon, and not to put the gentleman from Oregon upon a footing with the most favored members of this House. Gentlemen say that inasmuch as some persons are entitled to a very large amount as mileage, and this case is an exception, that we will take off the exception and pay him a larger compensation than is paid to any one here. Why, that is but increasing the difficulty. It is increasing this inequality. Gentlemen ought to address themselves rather to removing this injustice by equalizing the compensation of the members of this House. The House has shown a disposition very fully and frankly, and with singular unanimity, for the last four years, to bring about this equality, and the reason why they have not accomplished the object has been on account of difficulties in the other branch of the Capitol. I think every gentleman will concur with me in saying that it is not just for a portion of the members of this House to draw $5,000 per year, independent of their per diem, and others but $50. It is unjust, and ought to be remedied. I trust, therefore, that this bill will not pass; but that if the Committee on Mileage intend to act, they will act in such a manner as will put the whole question of mileage upon some equitable principle; then I will cooperate with them.

Mr. EVANS. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. EVANS. I then desire to offer the following amendment:

And that the Committee on Mileage be directed to add to the mileage of all the members of this House, and to divide the same by the number of members; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to pay to each member his share thereof, as so ascertained.

[Laughter.]

Mr. EVANS. It is very well for gentlemen to laugh; but I tell them that the members of this House will live to see the day when this proposition will be adopted.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. EVANS. I have not yet commenced to speak.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I merely want to ask the gentleman what is the distance which he travels in coming here?

Mr. EVANS. I will tell the gentleman before I sit down.

Mr. Speaker, in offering this amendment, I had no reference to the Delegate from Oregon. I had as lief that worthy and respected gentleman should receive the largest amount of mileage as any member of this House; but there has been existing in this House for years, the grossest injustice and inequality in reference to this matter, which ought to be removed. Now, for example, take my colleague, [Mr. BOWIE,] from the district immediately adjoining this city. He receives no mileage at all; yet I do not hesitate to say, that as far as his talents and a good attendance upon the duties of this House is concerned, he is not excelled by any member in this House. Yet there are gentlemen upon this floor who receive $2,500 mileage for coming here the first day of December, 1851, and $2,500 mileage for going back; making $5,000 more than is received by my colleague for his services. Then they receive $5,000 more for the next session, which makes $10,000 in the year that is received by certain gentlemen upon this floor, more than is received by my colleague from the district adjoining this city.

A MEMBER. You mean $10,000 for a Congress.

Mr. EVANS. No; it is all paid in the space of one revolution of this globe around the sun.

A MEMBER. But it is only $5,000 a session.

Mr. EVANS. Very well; it is $5,000 per session, and it makes no difference whether it is $5,000 a year or $10,000. There is that inequality existing. At the short session there is the same $5,000 additional pay for three months' service. Now, there is nothing in the distances from the seat of Government to justify that inequality.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks me how far I am from the seat of Government? I will tell him: I live about six hours distant from here; but I have to neglect my business quite as much as those who live at the remote parts of the Union. I am, by profession, a lawyer, and I lose my practice, as any gentleman upon this floor must. To be sure, I can go home and try a case, but I lose the opportunity of getting new cases as much as gentlemen who come from a thousand miles distant. Then, I ask, what good reason is there for one gentleman receiving $5,000 compensation more than another? It is a gross inequality, which ought to be put to an end.

The gentleman from Georgia, sitting before me, [Mr. TOOMBS,] is right in saying that this subject has before been investigated by the House of Representatives, and that this House has taken a firm stand in relation to it; and but for its defeat in the Senate, we would, long ago, have had the inequality corrected. The Committee on Mileage comes in here and seeks to perpetuate the evil—to extend the wrong. I protest against it. I hope the amendment which I have offered will be adopted, with a quit claim, upon my part, for my share of the money.

Mr. RICHARDSON obtained the floor.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I rise to a point of order. I wish to inquire whether it will be in order for any one interested in the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] to vote upon its adoption?

The SPEAKER. That will be a question for gentlemen and the House to decide.

Mr. SCURRY. I rise to a point of order. I desire to inquire whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] was to refer the bill, with instructions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maryland to move to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. SCURRY. According to my understanding, the gentleman had moved to refer the bill, but not to recommit it with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order to move to recommit with instructions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to amend the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Maryland. I propose the following amendment:

And that the Capitol be removed to within fifty miles of the residence of each and every member of this House, as soon as convenient.

Mr. HALL. Is that amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. HALL. Then I will propose an amendment to the instructions offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to know if I was not recognized by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana was recognized by the Chair, and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALL. I only desire to offer my amendment. I do not propose to offer any remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will allow the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. HALL. I propose the following amendment to the instructions:

That the members of Congress shall hereafter receive, as their compensation, the sum of $2,500 each, and their actual necessary traveling expenses, from their place of residence to the seat of Government of the United States for each session of Congress, in lieu of the pay and mileage allowed under existing laws.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order until the proposition to recommit is disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON. I propose to say a few words in reference to the proposition before the House. I believe I am correct in saying, that whenever a proposition has come up before us for what is called the reform of this mileage business, I have voted in favor of it. But I think I shall be able to show that gentlemen ought not to commence this reform with the bill now under consideration. I am in favor of equalizing this mileage, but I desire to show that the only way you can possibly make it equal, so far as the members of the present House are concerned, is to pass the bill now before the House. Some time ago we were all catechized by the chairman of the Committee on Mileage, as to what was the usually traveled route from our residences to the seat of Government, and as to what were the distances. We have, I suppose, severally made answer, and they have allowed us mileage according to the law of 1818, and we have drawn our mileage. Now, I ask the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] how he will go to work to make the equalization of which he speaks? Will he compel the members to pay it back again?

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not think the proposition will apply to any gentleman for the present session. The appropriation has been made, and the proposition will not affect the present members of the House in any way.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not the gentleman from Georgia see that it is doing the gentleman from Oregon the grossest injustice, by making this odious distinction against him?

Mr. TOOMBS. It is the law of the land.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, I know it is the law, but I ask him if it is magnanimous; if it is generous, on his part to ask to discriminate against one of his fellow members in that way? I know that the organic law of Oregon fixed the mileage of the Delegate from that Territory at $2,500; but I know also, that the Delegate from Oregon has never heretofore been paid that sum, he has always been paid more; by special provision in the appropriation bill he was placed upon an equality with the balance of us. Now, such existing law is upon the statute-book, because it was but a temporary provision, and expired with the appropriation bill of the year. It now falls back upon the organic law. Mr. Thurston was always paid more than $2,500. Here are the Representatives from California, who, under the law of 1818, get their long mileage. Here is the Delegate from Oregon, who comes several hundred miles further, that gets less than half the amount they receive. I want to put this question naked to this House, Will members who have drawn their long mileage and pocketed it, now vote that their brother member shall not be treated as liberally, be discriminated against, who receives less than one half the sum others have received, and at the same session? I am for reform, but let the general bill come up providing for putting us all upon an equality, and then I will go with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] but I will not vote to discriminate against any gentleman upon this floor, as will be the case if I vote against this bill as reported from the committee. It is a very good way for Buncombe to throw these amendments in this way, for the purpose of embarrassing the bill and defeating it. Let us have a naked vote upon the naked bill as reported from the committee, and see what the sense of the House is upon that subject.

It will be time enough hereafter to adjust this matter as to the manner it shall operate upon the House in future. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] admits that we cannot go back, we cannot make a retroactive law; and unless this bill passes, therefore the Delegate from Oregon must suffer under an odious and ungenerous discrimination.

Now I do not deem it necessary to argue the question as to whether $2,500 is compensation enough for a man who comes from Oregon. But I will simply state, that I do not think it is enough. I believe that those who come from the Pacific here, have to spend more money, in proportion, in coming to Washington, than any other members of this House, come whence they may.

It is an expensive, and a long and a dangerous trip, and moreover it cannot be performed between the long and the short sessions, and members from that section are obliged to come here at the commencement of a Congress and remain here until the end of it. An overland journey takes from four to six months.

Mr. STUART. I wish to submit a few remarks upon this question. I wish to say that I will join, at any time, the members of this or any other Congress, for the purpose of enacting a law on this subject, which shall operate equally upon all the members of this House. But, sir, I should do something besides making an equality of pay. Those of us who have had a little experience here, know full well that there are some members of this House who make more than one thousand dollars, upon certain occasions, in their business at home, and draw their per diem all the time they are making it.

Mr. CARTER, (interrupting.) To what portion of the House will those remarks apply?

Mr. STUART. In regard to that inquiry, I would say to the gentleman from Ohio, that it is of no importance to what portion of the members they apply. If we are going to act upon the principle of equality, let us do it in a proper manner.

[Here a message was received from the President of the United States by the hands of MILLARD P. FILLMORE, his Private Secretary.]

Mr. STUART, (resuming.) There have been many cases where a man has not spent one month here, during an entire long session of Congress, and yet has drawn his per diem for the whole session. Now, is this equality? Do gentlemen suppose that this question of equality can be reached in a minute? When you have reduced the mileage of each member to an equality, have we settled all? No such thing. It is necessary to call the roll here, and also to deduct the per diem for absence, before you will come near to an equality. Now, it is known to everybody, that gentlemen who reside in the States near this Capitol, go home, visit there, and return at their pleasure. But does their pay stop during the time? If a man is unwell, and goes home, and remains there until his convenience makes it proper for him to return, is his pay suspended? But suppose a man has the privilege, merely, of going home; then I would like to ask any gentleman who has a family, and children, how much he would give, as a matter of bargain, for the privilege of going home to visit them once a month, or once a week, or once in three months?

Mr. AVERETT, (interrupting.) In order to show the inequality of this mileage system, I would say that there are members upon this floor receiving $200, or even as low as $150 mileage, who find more difficulty in visiting their wives and children, and who do it less frequently, than others who are receiving from $800 to $1000 mileage.

Mr. STUART, (resuming.) All that goes to show the difficulty that exists in reducing this matter of mileage to an equality; and the only object I had in view, in offering my remarks, was to show to the House, in a few words, if I could, the impossibility of reaching that system of equality which all talk so much about, and which all desire so much.

But, sir, what is the proposition here? It is simply to place the Delegate from Oregon upon the same basis which every other gentleman in the House stands upon, until this day of millennium is arrived at. When we commence the general system of reform in regard to the mileage, this particular case will be comprehended in whatever system may be adopted. All that the committee now ask is, to place the Delegate from Oregon upon precisely the same basis occupied by every other gentleman here, until that object—which seems so easily to be accomplished by gentlemen, but which I think will be found a most difficult one, when they get at it—shall be finally accomplished.

Mr. SWEETSER. Mr. Speaker, I intend to move, before I sit down, to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union. The remarks I wish to make reflect not in the least degree upon the honorable member from California, or upon the committee that reported this bill. I desire to say to this House, that I have long since despaired of ever remedying this evil here; but I shall not be deterred from expressing my opinion and sentiments frankly upon the subject, although gentlemen may talk about Buncombe. Now, sir, at the time this territorial government was organized over Oregon, this House solemnly legislated in relation to this matter of mileage, and it was placed at the sum of $2,500 for the Delegate from that Territory. I have seen no reason for changing my opinion in relation to that matter, and I do not intend to change it in the vote I may give upon this bill. I intend, when this subject comes up in the Committee of the Whole House, to move to fix the mileage of the members of the House at a specific sum. I am not in favor of going beyond one thousand dollars, as mileage, to any member of this House, and fixing that as the maximum, and $500 as the minimum—making it uniform. That sum is sufficient. I move to refer this bill, with its amendments, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and upon that I call the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER,] to withdraw his motion until I can offer an amendment, which I think will meet with his approbation.

Mr. SWEETSER. Will you renew it?

Mr. ALLISON. I will.

Mr. SWEETSER. Then I withdraw my motion.

The amendment of Mr. ALLISON was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

That in computing the mileage of members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives, the same shall be computed by the most direct and shortest mail route, or by the shortest practicable traveled road, from the residence of each Senator and member of the House of Representatives to the seat of Government.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer this amendment, Mr. Speaker, because if such a resolution were adopted, it would relieve members of this House very much, when they are called upon to furnish the Committee on Mileage with the distances of their residences from the seat of Government. Now, sir, you are aware, and if you are not you have but to consult the Committee on Mileage to know it, that there are several routes from the residences of each of the members of this House to the seat of Government, and it sometimes embarrasses the members of that committee in computing the mileage of members; and it embarrasses not only the committee but members of the House. By that amendment I propose that the mileage shall be computed by the shortest mail route, or by the shortest traveled route. Now, I do not believe the spirit of the law will, although the language of it may, justify members in calculating their mileage by a circuitous route. I do not believe the spirit of the law recognizes or countenances such a calculation, although its letter does. I believe that when that law was passed, members of Congress had to reach this place by modes of travel altogether more difficult than those which they are now able to avail themselves of. Then, many of them had to come here on horseback, and I do not know but some of them had to come on foot. I believe it was intended that members should be paid a per diem in traveling. Many of them could not travel more than twenty miles a day, and it was intended that they should receive eight dollars for traveling that distance. Now, some of us can travel two or three hundred miles a day, by railroad, and in doing that, we travel, probably, a greater distance in one day than members formerly could in ten or fifteen days. I do not believe that the law contemplated such a state of things at all, and it is my conviction, that the law should be altered so that members be paid by the shortest practicable route. The law allows us now by the most usually traveled route. That in some cases is not the shortest by any means. I would not impugn the motives of any member of the House; but the law does give to members mileage by roads that are indeed almost twice as far as the direct road to and from their places of residence. The spirit of the law never intended this; and we should, if the letter of the law gives it, so modify it that it cannot be evaded. Let gentlemen travel as they may, by the direct, or that the most convenient and comfortable to themselves, but let them not charge the Government by the longest and most comfortable route. If they are disposed to travel a circuitous road of seven or eight hundred miles when they can reach the seat of Government by a road of four hundred miles, let them not charge by the eight hundred mile route. I think that there is great propriety in the adoption of the amendment, so as to restrict to the shortest practicable mail or traveled route. It will relieve the committee. You did me the honor, Mr. Speaker, of placing me upon that committee, and should I ever be permitted to meet in this Hall, when you are again constituting the committees, I would here merely give you a kind hint not to place me upon that committee. It is a very honorable and pleasant place to serve, but I do not desire to serve more than one session upon it. I trust we may now have in this House an indication of their disposition upon this subject. The committee wish to treat all the members here alike, to place them upon an equality, and to give all that the law allows; and yet we find, by conversing with friends, that there exists a desire to have the law altered. They say that its language, as it now stands, is wrong; therefore let us now have a test. I have no doubt but that every member here will vote for such an alteration. I have not found in my intercourse with the members, any who are opposed to it. I have offered this amendment to ascertain whether the committee shall hereafter be permitted to compute mileage by the shortest practicable route from the residence of members to the seat of Government. I wish the matter tested. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SWEETSER called for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. SWEETSER. I withdraw it unconditionally.

Mr. MARSHALL. I shall detain the House but a very few minutes. I am decidedly in favor of the original bill as reported by the committee; and it seems to me that in all this loose and irregular expression of the opinion of the House that that bill is the only single thing which points at all towards that equality and justice for which gentlemen pretend to contend. It is a singular sort of equality which would pay a gentleman who travels from here to Baltimore forty cents a mile as his traveling expenses, and which would pay a man who travels from Oregon or California here the sum of some two cents and a half per mile. Everybody who knows anything of the road, (and few gentlemen here do know anything about the greater portion of it,) knows that the ratio of danger and difficulty and expense increases infinitely with each mile as we go more remote from the Capitol. Let any gentleman attempt to effect a policy of insurance upon his life when he is going from Washington city to California, and mark the difference in the premium. And is not that a matter as fairly to be taken into consideration as the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS?] If a man exposes his life, as each man who makes this trip does imminently, is not that fairly to be taken into consideration? Is there any equality whatever in the naked principle logically and simply stated? Is there any principle upon which this depends? that a member who travels one hundred miles is to get forty cents a mile, and a member who travels three or four thousand miles is to get two and a half cents per mile, when the member who travels the longest distance has to pay in proportion greater for expenses than the member who travels the shortest distance? Is it possible for any question to be clearer? It is obvious gentlemen cannot in this effort be actuated simply by a desire for equality. Gentlemen talk of the sacrifice which all other members make here—of neglect and the loss of business. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] says that he is a lawyer. I am a lawyer also, and I dare say have received more in a single fee—more for a single two hours' discussion, than that gentlemen ever did in any one year—when the most lucrative year of his practice. My seat upon this floor costs me more. I make each and every day a greater sacrifice in the advancement of my private and personal fortune than any man in this House; infinitely more. Members ought to bear in mind these collateral facts. A member that comes back from California is entitled, in the minds of the House, to the consideration of another fact, that he not only has to come back from California, but that he had to go there. I know that I myself was nine months in making that trip—nine months of peril and of danger. I felt when I started that I had a high mission to accomplish; one in which I have persisted regularly, constantly, and perseveringly ever since. Other men did not choose to undertake it. Other gentlemen having comfortable, convenient, easy, lucrative situations at home preferred remaining there. It costs some gentlemen nothing to come to Congress. It costs them nothing to run for Congress. It cost me a year of my life, with many, many chances of losing it altogether. I beg leave to assure the House, that my mileage, great as it looks to a man in the States, did not bring me even with my actual expenditures in the canvass by which I now hold this seat here. I was out of pocket after I got from the Sergeant-at-Arms all even of this seemingly extravagant mileage. Gentlemen seem, however, to forget all the facts in reference to California—even that her members are very inadequately compensated for their trouble and expense in getting here. I paid in gold dust more money than I have received from the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House. Now, where would be the equality in cutting down this rate? Why, the barley feed for my mule—and we travel there where none could go but a mule—is fifty cents per pound, and you have to feed a great many pounds in scrambling over such rocks as we have to scramble over; fifty cents a pound, or five dollars a day, for the mere feeding of your animal: twenty-five cents a drink, [laughter,] and the people of California will once in a while take a drink in election times, when the great Democratic party is making a powerful, and as it turned out, a successful effort, to organize itself. In great and exciting times like that, the people of California will sometimes take a drink; and you have to pay a quarter for it every time. [Laughter.] You have to pay in the mountains even more. The circumstances of any gentleman of any relation there are widely different from what they are here; and these differences ought fairly to be taken into consideration. They talk about equality: I say this mileage does not make me on an equality with any of those gentlemen, especially the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER;] and I will venture that, at the end of any Congressional term, the gentleman from Ohio, who was so violent in his denunciations of the inequalities of mileage paid to us, is very much more the gainer than any Delegate from any remote Territory whatever, upon the mere pay and mileage; and he has got twice as much now clear profit—twice as much as I have, or could by possibility have.

I was in the hope that it was not necessary for me to say anything at all upon the subject to-day. I mean at a proper period to discuss it more seriously and more at length. I have contented myself, at present, with merely showing that there was at least one man in the House who does not hold to the opinions which have been expressed so readily all around.

But here is an opinion which I have to express. If gentlemen think this matter of mileage is a humbug—that it is a living injustice; that it is a reproach to Congress—if gentlemen want to talk to Buncombe about these questions, I have a proposition to make, which I do now make expressly to Buncombe, and I want the Reporters to write it down—I will sacrifice all my mileage readily. I am able to do it, thank Providence and the gold mines. I will give up all my mileage. I say, just acknowledge the whole system a humbug; dispense with it entirely, and there is not a man in this House who will accord his consent to it so cheerfully and so readily as I will. There is not a man who cares so little about money as I do, as I have always cared, and as I hope to care while I live. I say, give up the mileage entirely, and restrict ourselves to the per diem. Let a bill of that kind be reported, and it will receive my cheerful and ready consent. But there has been in the whole legislation of the country, ever since California attempted to be admitted into the Union up to this moment, a system of distinctions and discriminations against that State, which is enough to drive any generous and independent people into resentment, and into a very serious expression of their resentment. Illustrations of this occur to me constantly. There is found three ounces of gold dust in Georgia and North Carolina, and all at once a Mint springs over the spot to coin it. We have a hundred millions a year, and we cannot get a blacksmith shop, and we do not want anything better—any sort of a log hut—so the Government will send its sovereign power there to stamp our gold with the mark of its true value, and to give it its market value as it comes from the mines and the hands of the laborer. That is all we ask, and we cannot get it done. In New Orleans $3,000,000 have been appropriated for a custom-house, and in San Francisco $300,000—San Francisco being infinitely ahead at the same time in the revenue she yields to the Government. These are two of the hundreds of odious and unreasonable discriminations which are made by this Government against the State I represent here.

I have forbore to speak of these things—have never sought to speak of them; but the neglect of this House upon the one hand, and its spasmodic activity upon the other—the utter neglect, on the one hand, to make appropriations absolutely necessary for California, and the promptitude and readiness exhibited upon the other hand to cut down the compensation of the Representative from that State, would make it meanness in me to forbear longer from showing, at least, that California has got some sort of Representative upon this floor, who means to have her voice distinctly heard.

Mr. WOODWARD. I merely wished to suggest my reasons for approving the report of the committee, when I inquired whether there was not a general law and restriction applicable to all members. It is stated, however, that that restriction has been overlooked heretofore. I cannot help it. I do not think it a very material matter that it has been, setting apart the consideration of morality. I rise now to make an observation in reference to the proposition of the gentleman over the way, who has submitted an amendment. The object of that amendment is to determine by what indications the route proper to be traveled by the member, shall be selected. The aim is to reduce the compensation of the members of the legislative branch of the Government—at least I so understand it. And here I have a pertinent inquiry to put: Why is it that the members of the legislative branch of the Government are perpetually assailing their own compensation, without our ever hearing any complaint of the compensations given to any other branch? Why has your President never besought you to reduce his compensation? Have your heads of Departments ever clamored here to have their compensations reduced? Has your Army ever done it? Has your Navy ever asked this? Have your Diplomatic Corps ever complained that they received too much? Such a proposition from either of these services would fill this House and the country with amazement. And yet these officers receive compensations, in some cases, two hundred per cent. higher than the compensation given to members of this House. Your President receives $25,000 a year. Your Heads of Departments receive, I think, each about $6,000 a year. Your Judiciary receive $5,000 a year. Your Diplomatic Corps receive from $6,000 to $18,000 a year, and that year made as short as the President may choose to make it. Your first-rate subordinates under the President receive $6,000 a year; your second-rate subordinates receive from $3,000 to $4,000 a year. Your third-rate subordinates receive from $1,600 to $2,500 a year. And yet, never, from the foundation of this Government, has one solitary Executive subordinate besought you to reduce his compensation. But is this all? No, sir. They have, on the contrary, a large proportion of them, besought you continually to increase that compensation. The clamor here in this body, for raising the comparatively exaggerated compensations, in the other Departments, is only equalled by the clamor to reduce our own. Now, I put it to gentlemen upon this floor, who stand up here as patriots, as they say, and do doubtless imagine that they are prompted by love for the people and the country, why is this? Why is it, tell me, that the same member to-day claims to have reduced his own compensation, and to-morrow rises here and advocates an increase of compensation to subordinates in the executive branch? I leave gentlemen to answer the question, laying their hands upon their bosoms, what is the reason of this?

The Government of the United States is called a Democracy, and Democracy is a government in which the people elect those to make the laws who hold the offices. But here, within this Hall, are all the officers elected by the people under our system? Your President appoints the whole Executive branch; he appoints the whole judicial branch; he appoints the whole diplomatic corps. He makes your Army and Navy. And yet what a spectacle do we present? Placed here by the Constitution to sustain this branch of the Government, we are but instruments to prostrate it. Why, even those so-called Federalists, such as Hamilton and Morris, were all agreed, that this was the supreme branch of the Government, and that the other branches were merely subordinate. But what do we see in practice? Why, you find this body enlisted continually in its own degradation, and everything is done that can be done by it to destroy its own dignity and independence. The salaries paid to an Auditor, not to go up to the first-rate subordinates of the President, are such as to seduce men from this body—even from the Senate—from the Chief Magistracy of a State. Men will abandon the office of Chief Magistrate of a State to become commercial agents in some foreign port. Now, can this body possibly maintain its own dignity and independence under such a state of things?

I do not wish to go further into this subject at this time, as I do not conceive it to be fully and regularly before the body. I hope the bill will be re-committed to the committee, with the amendment of the gentleman over the way, [Mr. ALLISON.] But what I have to say finally is this, and what I shall embrace some more appropriate occasion to enlarge upon, that except you give to the members of the legislative branch of the people—the elected branch of the Government—compensation that will put officers beyond all temptation which your President can offer them in any office, this branch of the Government will fall into contempt and disgrace.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have not heard any gentleman upon this floor advocating the doctrine which the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD,] who has just taken his seat, seems to impute to them. I do not consider that those who are for equalizing mileage and compensation are for degrading the Legislative Department of the Government.

Mr. WOODWARD. I took occasion to make remarks with reference to the general habit and spirit of this House as manifested since I have been a member, stating at the time, that I conceived the present proposition, as according with those objects. I contended that the compensation of members ought to be made just between one and the other, and my reason for recommitting the bill is with that view, to make the compensation equal as far as possible.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand the principle of the bill now before us to be the removal of the limitation now existing upon the present very unequal system. If the bill pass, the system will be more unequal than it now is. The gentleman certainly advocated the passage of the bill as reported by the gentleman upon my left, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] Now, I put it to this House, and the country, if it is just that the present unequal system should be rendered more so? Is it right that one member should receive $40 mileage and others shall receive $5,000? Does it add to our dignity as members of a legislative branch of the Government, that this inequality should exist, much less that it should be increased?

Mr. WOODWARD. I stated that the general law limited it—

Mr. STEPHENS. We have been told that the general law was imperative. I am not informed upon that subject. It is for me, however, to give my opinion and vote upon the bill before this House. Now this bill proposes to repeal that provision of the existing law by which the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon is limited to $2,500; and I think that $2,500 is a sufficient maximum limitation upon the mileage of all members of Congress. The gentleman wishes to put the members of this House upon an equal footing with your Judiciary. Well, sir, I shall not oppose that; but I am opposed to putting some above others. All, in my opinion, should be put upon the same footing. Do not put the Delegate from Oregon, or the Representatives from California, or the Representatives from Utah, when that shall become a State, upon a position higher and more elevated than members from Georgia or South Carolina, Maryland or Virginia: let us have equality. Whatever may be necessary to elevate your legislative department—whatever may be essential to carry out this object, do it, and I will be with the gentleman. It is because I am for justice and equality, that I am opposed to this bill. I see no reason for giving the Delegate from Oregon a salary of $5,000 as mileage, when a member from Maryland gets but $40. The gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] says that upon a settlement with the Sergeant-at-Arms, after taking his expenses into consideration, he was minus. But what expenses does he bring into the account? His legitimate traveling expenses to and from California only? By no means. But his expenses in traveling in that rugged country in his canvass, and all the expenses incident to an electioneering of campaign, including mule feed and even his own grog-bill at twenty-five cents a drink. Now, I ask this House if it is our duty, and if we should recognize this principle, that the expenses of electioneering campaigns incurred by the members of the House are to be paid out of the public Treasury as mileage to members? Is it by sanctioning any such principle that we are to elevate the dignity of this House? My opinion is, that these considerations should not enter into our views at all, and should not control our action here. And while we should see that the pay or compensation of all is enough to sustain the Legislature as an independent co-ordinate branch of the Government, we should not for any consideration allow an unequal and exorbitant amount to be paid to any particular member or class of members. The effect of this bill is to give an exorbitant amount, compared with the compensation of other members, to the Delegate from Oregon. We should have some general and just system. If $5,000 besides per diem is just for the Delegate from Oregon, it is equally just for all the rest. I am for an equal and just system of compensation. This bill has no such object. So far from it, its object is to increase the present inequality, by removing the restrictions put upon the amount to be paid to the Delegate from Oregon. If this be done, it will be opening the doors for greater inequalities than those now existing and on account of which there has been so much and just complaint for years, in the mileage, both of members and Senators. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and upon that question I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I wish to say a word only in—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will withdraw my motion for the gentleman from California to make a personal explanation.

Mr. MARSHALL. I did not suppose that my remarks, playfully made, would bear the construction that my traveling expenses, and grog bills included, should be paid by the Government. That portion of my remarks was addressed as a reply to remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] who had gone into a statement of the loss which had accrued to him, and which did accrue to other members, by running for Congress and taking seats here. Among other things, he mentioned the loss of his professional practice. I say that my bill of items is as legitimate matter for consideration as the others which had been urged; and that the peculiar condition and expenses connected with the country which I represent, are fairly to be considered, and ought to go to make up that equality for which I contend. That is what I said, and what I meant to say.

Mr. STEPHENS. In reply to the gentleman from California, I will simply say, that I am utterly opposed to permitting any of these incidental expenses of the campaign to enter into the compensation of members. How expensive it must be to carry an election, either in the city of Baltimore or New York! for although there are no mules to be employed there, I expect there is a great deal of grog to be drunk. I now renew the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, William Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bartlett, Bennett, Bibb, Bibb, Bock, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Churchwell, Cleveland, Clingan, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dockery, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Floyd, Fowler, Henry M. Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Perkins, Savage, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Skelton, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benj. Thompson, Toombs, Walbridge, Washburn, Watkins, Alexander White, and Wildrick—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, David J. Bailey, Beale, Bissell, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Buell, Busby, Caskey, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Colcock, Conger, Daniel, J. G. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, Walsh, Ward, Welch, Addison White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—101.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. SWEETSER renewed the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that motion he demanded the previous question.

The question was taken on seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 70, noes 44—no quorum voting.

Mr. STUART called for tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was again taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes not counted.

So the previous question received a second.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. ROBINSON inquired what was the question pending?

The SPEAKER stated that a motion had been made to recommit the bill to the committee that reported it, with certain instructions, to which instructions an amendment was pending; another motion had been made to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, without instructions; and upon that motion the vote would first be taken.

Mr. EVANS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to modify my instructions so as in the first place to pay all the expenses of actual travel of every member.

Mr. KING, of New York, and several other members, objected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say to the friends of this bill—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can address the House only by unanimous consent, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. He reported the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The chairman of the committee who reported the bill, has a right to speak for one hour.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to remind the Chair, that it has been again and again decided, that on a motion to refer to a committee, the chairman is not entitled under the rules to speak.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARTER demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is it in order now, again to move to lay the bill upon the table? The SPEAKER. It is. Mr. STEPHENS. Then I make that motion.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on Mr. SWEETSER's motion.

Mr. STEPHENS. I withdraw the motion to lay the bill upon the table, until the vote shall have been taken on the motion to refer the bill.

The question was then taken on Mr. SWEETSER's motion; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 96, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Barrere, Bartlett, Bibbiana, Bocoek, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Curtis, Daniel, George T. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Evans, Floyd, Fowler, Henry M. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Stuart, Geo. W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Ward, Welch, Wilcox, and Williams—96.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the next question?

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the amendment to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has already been ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to lay the bill and all the amendments pending upon the table; and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Chas. Allen, William Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Thos. H. Bayly, Barrere, Bartlett, Bennett, Bibbiana, Bocoek, John H. Boyd, Brooks, Geo. H. So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question recurred upon Mr. ALLISON's amendment to the instructions to the Committee on Mileage, proposed by Mr. EVANS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is the previous question exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question will apply first to the amendment proposed to the instructions; second, to the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Mileage, with instructions, and if not committed, the bill will then be put upon its engrossment.

The question was then taken on Mr. ALLISON's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. EVANS's motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. EVANS. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House so to modify the instructions as to provide for the traveling expenses of every member of the House before equalizing the mileage.

[Loud cries of "Object!"]

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved that the House do now adjourn; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. WILDRICK, who, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back as correctly enrolled "An act to admit the hermaphrodite brig Sylphide to register," which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. HARRIS then renewed the motion to adjourn.

And the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 73.

So the House adjourned until to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 17, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The President pro tem. laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 24th February, 1851, transmitting copies of proxies given to represent the stock of the United States in the Louisville and Portland canal, with the instructions which accompanied said proxies, and a list of the stockholders in said canal, with the amount of stock owned by each; which was read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have already introduced a bill, which is upon the files of the Senate, proposing to purchase the remaining stock in that canal possessed by individuals, to make it a free canal, and to enlarge it. I believe the Committee on Roads and Canals also have the subject under consideration. I think a proper disposition of the communication would be, to let it lie on the table, and have it printed for the use of the Senate, unless the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Bright] wishes to make some other disposition of it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I suppose the communication is connected with a bill which I have had the honor to introduce to the Senate. I therefore move its reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMUNICATION FROM KOSKUTH.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has received a letter from Louis Koskuth, inclosing a communication which was made, as he says, to the President of the United States, expressing his gratitude and thanks to the two Houses of Congress, and to the various Heads of Departments for the manner in which he was received in Washington. The letter which he has addressed to me will be read.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, February 14, 1852.

To the Hon. W. R. KING,

President of the Senate:

SIR: Before I left Washington city I felt myself bound by gratitude to return my warmest thanks to the Government and the Congress of the United States, for their generous patronage they had so kindly granted to me as the humble representative of my country, from the time when they had sent a steam frigate to Asia, in order to restore me to liberty and activity, to the moment when the august Senate and House and the President bade me welcome in the Capitol and in the White House.

Not initiated into the diplomatic forms of the United States, I respectfully directed my farewell to his Excellency the President, and requested him to communicate my assurance of everlasting gratitude to the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The Secretary of State had since the great kindness to inform me, though his letter has reached me but recently, that my request in respect to the communication would have been gladly complied with, if it were consistent with the accepted forms; and he suggested it to me, as a more appropriate way, to send copies of my address to the Presidents of the Senate and of the House.

It is upon this suggestion of the Secretary of State that I have now the great honor to inclose the feeble expression of my everlasting gratitude and hope, with the request to have it communicated to the august body of which you are the President.

Mr. President of the Senate, your most humble and devoted servant,
L. KOSSUTH.

The PRESIDENT. The communication addressed to the President of the United States was inclosed in that address to me. Does the Senate desire that communication to be read?

Mr. DOWNS. Yes; I wish to hear it read.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no!

The PRESIDENT. Not being addressed to the Senate, it is for the Senate to determine. It cannot be read unless such is the pleasure of the Senate.

There being no objection, it was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 12, 1852.

PRESIDENT: The most generous invitation contained in an act of the Congress of the United States, approved and officially transmitted to me by your Excellency, having afforded me the distinguished honor of being acceptably presented, by the illustrious Secretary of State, to the Chief Magistrate of the Republic:

Having been, upon subsequent resolutions of Congress, received with almost unprecedented honors, by the Senate and by the House of Representatives:

Having been entertained with unsurpassed kindness by the Senators and Representatives of the United States, obliged with courtesies far exceeding my aspirations by the heads of the various departments of the Executive Government, and favored by marks of kind attention and sympathy by the honorable members of Congress, in numbers which almost equaled the aggregate of the two illustrious bodies of this great Republic: The time has come when the exigencies of my country's affairs require me to depart from the city of Washington, and fulfill the agreeable duty of acknowledging personally that protective sympathy which many towns, cities, and States, of this glorious Confederation, continue to manifest in favor of the just cause of my country's downtrodden independence and the freedom of the European continent, so intimately connected with it.

This my departure becoming more urgent, as according to the present condition of Europe every moment's accident may call on me to answer those duties, which, in obedient compliance with my nation's sovereign will I assumed, when as unanimously elected Governor of the State of Hungary, I took oath to God and the people to maintain that national independence which my nation had asserted so heroically, and had declared so legitimately; it is a matter of deep regret to me not to be able individually to express my everlasting warm gratitude.

But though my mind be mournfully impressed with inconsolable grief at the melancholy intelligence connected with the last moments of my staying here, that the heart of my beloved and venerable mother has broken under the renewed cruel persecution inflicted upon my family by the House of Austria, still, I cannot take my departure from the capital without leaving a formal, but sincere, acknowledgment of all those memorable favors so generously bestowed upon me.

Conscious as I am that these honors were neither deserved by, nor intended to me personally, who, an humble exile, never could consent to see myself aggrandized while my country lies in ruin and in chains, I have then all the more thankfully received as manifestations of the respect for the everlasting principles of national law, and of the lively sympathy which this great and generous country entertains for my beloved and never for a moment to be forgotten fatherland, now a temporary victim of the violation of those principles.

The oppressed nations of the European Continent, so highly interested in those principles, will look with consolation at these memorable favors I was honored with, as to a practical proof that the Chief Magistrate of this great Republic was indeed a true interpreter of its people's sentiments, and met with the cordial concurrence of the enlightened legislature of his glorious country, when he officially declared that "the United States cannot remain indifferent in a case in which the strong arm of a foreign power is invoked to stifle public sentiment and to oppress the spirit of freedom in any country."

This magnanimous declaration, followed by such generous manifestations, will be recorded in history as a protestation in behalf of the everlasting principles of the law of nations against their infraction by violence. And the millions of my people will revive with hope and confidence when they shall come to know what favors were bestowed upon their exiled chief by the great Republic of the West, in acknowledgment of the justice of Hungary's cause.

In her name, and as her representative, I have received them, and they have sunk into the very heart of my heart—in her name, and as her representative, I feel the duty of expressing my thanks for them, and desire your Excellency, as well as the Executive officers, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, collectively and individually, to receive the assurances of my and my country's eternal gratitude.

Sad and solemn is the hour of parting from a presence so consoling and so august; but I carry with me, in my further wandering, the hope that the United States will continue kindly to remember always my unhappy but most well-deserving fatherland.

Neither the pangs of exile, nor the egotism of my patriotic feelings, or the interests of all those nations whose common rights and wrongs I plead before the mighty tribunal of publicity, will ever induce me to desire that the United States should for our sake put in jeopardy the own welfare and prosperity of this glorious home of liberty; but as the present condition of Europe, and the coming events in that Continent, which cast already their shadows before them, cannot fail to attract the attention and invite the consideration of such a Power on earth as the United States are, I cannot forbear to hope that the very consciousness of that security which the United States enjoy, while the greatest part of Europe quakes, will but more impress upon their true republican generosity the sentiments of supreme urgency, to pronounce in respect to the law of nations and international duties and rights, as also in respect to the undisturbed safety of commercial intercourse in favor of such principles which, founded upon the law of nature and of nature's God, are equally consistent with the fundamental principles of this great Republic, and indispensable to peace and contentment on earth.

Humanity would hail such a pronouncement from such a place with inexpressible joy; and as it was the violation of these principles by armed foreign interference in Hungary which opened the door to a system of overwhelming despotism on the European continent, the very fact that Hungary, forced by the most treacherous oppression ever seen in the history of mankind, has, in declaring its independence, but exercised that right and followed that principle upon which stand so gloriously the very political existence of the United States, and the fact that this legitimate independence was overthrown by the most cruel violation of international laws, makes me confidently hope that "the deep interest which the people of the United States feel in the spread of liberal principles, and the establishment of free Governments—the warm sympathy with which it witnesses every struggle against oppression," as well as its profound sentiment of justice, and its congenial generosity, will become a source of such consolation to my native land as the supreme constitutional authorities of this glorious Republic will, in their wisdom, deem consistent with the paramount duties towards their own country's welfare and prosperity.

It is with these sentiments of hope and thanks that I beg leave to reiterate the assurance of my everlasting respect and gratitude, and humbly entreat your Excellency to be pleased to communicate this my respectful farewell to the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. President, your Excellency's most humble and obedient servant,
L. KOSSUTH.

Mr. BADGER. As these communications have been read, and as we have all listened to them with extreme attention, and are possessed of their interesting and valuable contents, unless my friends from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] and New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] one or all of them, desire some reference of them, I will submit the motion that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I move that they be printed.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose that goes to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT. It goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope the Senator then will withdraw his motion, for I have no wish to report upon the question.

The motion was not withdrawn.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BADGER presented a memorial of R. Rogers, a memorial of Thomas R. Glenn, a memorial of Corday Y. Savage, and a memorial of W. R. Saville, assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census, in North Carolina, praying additional compensation, which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial of assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in Hancock county, Maine, praying additional compensation; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WADE presented six memorials of assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in Ohio, praying additional compensation; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Seth Sprague and others, members of a company of "Sea Fencibles," during the last war with Great Britain, praying remuneration for money expended and services rendered in the defence of their country; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of William W. Cox, praying compensation for services as messenger in the office of the Sixth Auditor; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of inhabitants of Stockbridge, Massachusetts, praying the adoption of measures for the amicable adjustment of international controversies; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, for his colleague, [Mr. CLAY,] to whom it had been transmitted, presented a petition of citizens of Cedarville, Ohio, praying the recognition of the independence of Liberia, and the establishment of a line of mail steamers between the United States and that Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CASS presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying the adoption of measures to prevent any further interference by Russia in the struggle of the people of Hungary for liberty; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of petty officers and seamen on board the United States steamer Missouri, at the time of her destruction at Gibraltar, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. McRAE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Richard Elevard, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GEYER moved that the petition and papers of John Chalmers be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, for the purpose of presenting them to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT. Has there been a report in that case?

Mr. GEYER. An adverse report was made in 1841, in which I learn that the Senate concurred. The object in withdrawing these papers, is to present them to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT. The Senate having concurred in the adverse report, these papers, under the rule, cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. GEYER. Such was my impression, but I learn from the Secretary that as they are not to be withdrawn for use in the Senate, but in the House of Representatives, they may be withdrawn for presentation to that body.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will read the rule, and leave it to the Senate to say whether it embraces the object of the Senator from Missouri. His proposition is to withdraw those papers, upon which an adverse report was made and concurred in by the Senate, with the view to have them presented to the House of Representatives. The rule is in these words:

"Whenever a claim is presented to the Senate and referred to a committee, and the committee report that the claim ought not to be allowed, and the report be adopted by the Senate, it shall not be in order to move to take the papers from the files for the purpose of referring them at a subsequent session, unless the claimants shall present a memorial for that purpose, stating in what manner the committee have erred in their report, or that new evidence has been discovered since the report, and setting forth the new evidence in the memorial: Provided, That this rule shall not extend to any case where an adverse report, not in writing, shall have been made prior to the 25th January, 1842."

The object of the rule, as established, was, in the opinion of the Chair, to prevent papers from being withdrawn when an adverse report was made and concurred in, unless additional testimony was presented, or satisfactory evidence given to show that the committee had erred in the report. The Senator is under the impression that it refers only to cases which it is proposed to present to the Senate again. The Chair will leave it to the Senate to say whether that was the object or not.

The Senate decided that the rule precluded the withdrawal asked for by the Senator from Missouri.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

On the motion of Mr. JONES, of Iowa, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

Mr. HUNTER addressed the Senate at some length against the bill, and also against the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] and replied to the speech of Mr. SUMNER, made on the 27th of January last, in favor of the bill. Mr. H. was followed by Mr. BELT, in reply. These speeches will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. SUMNER. One word, if you please, Mr.

President. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] has very kindly given me notice that I am to expect a broadside from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] For this I am properly grateful to him. When, a few days ago, I undertook to discuss an important question in this body, I expressed certain views, deemed by me of weight. Those views I submitted to the candor and to the judgment of the Senate. I felt confidence in their essential justice, and nothing which I have heard since has impaired that confidence. I have listened with respect and attention to the address to-day from the Senator from Virginia, as it becomes me to listen with respect and attention to everything any Senator in this body undertakes to put forth here. But I hope to be excused if I say, that in all that he has so eloquently uttered with reference to me, he has not touched by a hair-breadth my argument. He has criticised—I am unwilling to say that he has caviled at—my calculations; but he has not by the ninth part of a hair touched the conclusion which I drew. That still stands. And let me say that it cannot be successfully assailed in the way which has been attempted to-day.

I said that injustice had been done to the land States, out of this body and in this body—out of this body, because I often heard them called "land stealers" and "land pirates;" in this body by the Senator from Virginia, when he complained of the partial distribution of the public lands, and particularly pointed out the bill now before the Senate as an instance of this partiality. I said that this charge was without foundation. And why did I say so? and on what ground? Because there was an existing equity (I so called it—nothing more) on the part of the land States as against the General Government. And on what was this founded? On a fact of record in the public acts of this country. That is, the exemption of the public domain situated in particular States from taxation. The Senator from Virginia has not questioned this fact; of course he could not question it, for it is embodied in the acts of Congress.

The next inquiry then was, What is the value of this immunity from taxation, which I called an equity on the part of the land States? In order to illustrate this value, I went into calculations and estimates, which I presented, after some study of the subject—not, perhaps, such study as the Senator from Virginia has found time to give to it, or such as the Senator from Kentucky, in the plenitude of his researches, doubtless has given to it. On those calculations and estimates I attributed a certain value to the equity in question. My calculations and estimates may be overstated; they may be exaggerated. The Senator from Virginia thinks them so. Other gentlemen with whom I have had the privilege of conversing, think them understated. But however this may be, it does not touch the argument. I may have done injustice to my argument by overstating them. I intended to understate them. I still think, from all that I hear, that I have understated them. The argument, however, still stands, that these States have conceded to the General Government an immunity from taxation; that this immunity has a certain value—I think a very large value—and that this value constitutes an equity to which the land States have a right to appeal for bountiful, aye, for munificent treatment from the General Government. Has the Senator from Virginia answered this? Can he answer it?

But I forbear to go into the subject at this time. I arose simply to state, that as the Senator from Virginia has kindly given me notice that I am to expect a broadside from the Senator from Kentucky, I am to regard what he said to-day, so far as I am concerned, simply as a signal gun. The Senator will pardon me if I say it is nothing more, for it has not reached me, or anything that I said. Meanwhile I await, with resignation and without anxiety, the broadside from Kentucky.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. After having heard my proposition discussed for some days, I desire to make some general reply to the arguments against it. I believe it has been usual to allow that privilege to the mover of a proposition of such magnitude as that which I have offered. If, therefore, the Senate will be kind enough to adjourn now, I shall endeavor to present my defence to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will allow me to ask for an Executive session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To accommodate the Senator from South Carolina, I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. BUTLER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and then, on motion, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 17, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. OLDS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution calling upon one of the Departments for information. I will state that it is information which is very much needed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object, and call for the regular order of business. We shall never get to the regular order of business if we give way for these resolutions to be introduced.

Mr. OLDS. You will delay the action of the House a great deal more by keeping back the action of committees.

Mr. JONES. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is the unfinished business of yesterday, to recommit the bill regulating the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon, with instructions.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, which it is very necessary should be introduced as soon as possible, in order that it may be printed. It will call for the early action of the House, either in favor of or against it. I hope I shall have the unanimous consent of the House to report it.

Mr. OLDS. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object to that?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; I do object. [Laughter.]

MILEAGE OF THE DELEGATE FROM OREGON.

The SPEAKER. The question will now be put upon the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Mileage, with instructions.

Mr. CARTTER demanded the yeas and nays.

Several VOICES. Read the instructions.

They were then read by the Clerk, as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Mileage, with instructions to add together the mileage of all the members of this House, and to divide the same by the number of members; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to pay to each member his share thereof, as so ascertained.

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether there is not pending a substitute, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALLISON,] for the instructions providing that the mileage shall be computed by the shortest and most direct routes to the residence of each Senator and Representative?

The SPEAKER. That was rejected by a vote of the House yesterday.

Mr. BRENTON. I desire to inquire if the question is not susceptible of division, so that the vote shall first be taken on the instructions?

The SPEAKER. According to the practice of the House—in the recollection of the Chair—the two propositions cannot be divided. The Chair, however, is of a different opinion, so far as the rules are concerned. He thinks that under the rules the proposition is divisible.

Mr. BRENTON. My opinion is, that the proposition is susceptible of division, so that it shall be taken first upon the instructions.

The SPEAKER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

The House was divided on the call for the yeas and nays, and only 20 gentlemen rose.

Mr. CARTTER called for tellers upon the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and Messrs. WILLIAMS and CHANDLER were appointed.

The House was divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COBB. Is it competent to ask the gentleman from Maryland to modify his instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not in his power to modify.

Mr. COBB. I desire that the instructions shall be so modified that all the money made by gentlemen when they are absent from the service of the House, shall be put into the common stock, and divided, with the mileage, equally among the members of the House. [Laughter.] If they were so modified, I should be disposed to vote for them.

Mr. EVANS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to so modify the instructions as to provide for first allowing to each member his traveling expenses in reaching the seat of Government, out of the whole amount of mileage, before equalizing the compensation of members, as proposed.

Mr. ROBINSON and others objected.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it competent to move to suspend the rules to allow the gentleman from Maryland to modify his instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not competent to move to suspend the rules, except on Monday.

A Voice. Withdraw your instructions.

Mr. EVANS. I will, then, withdraw the instructions.

Mr. STUART. I object.

Mr. EVANS. I understand that I have the right to withdraw.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt whether, after the previous question has been sustained, the gentleman can withdraw his proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly, he has clearly the right to withdraw. I will call the attention of the Chair to the 45th rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has read the rule, and has no doubt that the gentleman has the right to withdraw.

Mr. EVANS. Do I understand the Chair to decide that I have the right either to withdraw or amend?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman certainly has the right to withdraw under the rule.

Mr. EVANS. I will withdraw my instructions.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the previous question been exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It has not been exhausted, and discussion is not in order.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman from Maryland has moved to recommit the bill with instructions. Now, if he withdraws the instructions, does not the other part of the motion fail?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the motion to recommit was not affected by the withdrawal of the second branch of the proposition, and it is still pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether, after the gentleman has withdrawn his instructions, it is competent to recommit the bill without instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is competent, in the opinion of the Chair.

The question was then taken on the motion to recommit, and the result was—yeas 84, nays 86, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, William Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bennett, Bibbigaus, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brooks, G. H. Brown, Burrows, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. So the House refused to recommit the bill to the Committee on Mileage.

Mr. STUART. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to recommit the bill, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CARTTER. Upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, John Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Beale, Bell, Bissell, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Busby, Caskey, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Colcock, Daniel, John G. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Toombs, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, and Wildrick—90.

So the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FITCH. I move to reconsider the vote just taken. I believe the previous question is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FITCH. If so, then the bill and report are up again for discussion. I shall not make many remarks upon them, and regret that in remarks which I shall make I may be compelled to make allusions to the former opinions and course of certain members upon this floor, in order to throw some light upon the probable motive of their opposition to the bill. I look upon the bill as one calculated merely to render an act of strict justice to a Delegate occupying a seat here. I do not defend the law of 1818, as is well known by the older members of this House, because, as chairman of the Committee on Mileage during the last Congress, I asked repeatedly a modification of that law. I moved amendments to different appropriation bills, asking a construction of that mileage law different from the one now placed upon it, or at least asking that the mileage might be computed in altogether a different manner from what it now is. It will be recollected by the older members of the House, that I asked that the mileage might be computed by the nearest mail route, as reported by the Post Office Department. The whole matter, in fact, was before the committee of the last Congress, and was brought, by that committee, before this House. Amendments, in one or two cases—two cases, if I mistake not—were adopted by this House, but a concurrence in them was refused upon the part of the other and coordinate branch of the legislative department occupying the other wing of this Capitol. It was manifest, long before the expiration of that Congress, that no material modification could be obtained, and I fear even now—though I understand it is the intention of the Committee on Mileage to report a bill making a modification of that law—I say, I fear now it will meet with the same opposition from the same quarter. I was struck somewhat with the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS], whose argument seems to be based upon the supposition that this bill, which we are informed is to be introduced by the Committee on Mileage, changing the mileage law, will operate upon the present Congress. If so, I grant there would be an impropriety in the passage of this bill, because another bill from the same committee, proposing a law to operate upon all alike, would operate, of course, upon the Delegate from Oregon. But the gentleman destroyed the effect of his own argument by admitting to my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] that a bill of that kind would not operate upon this Congress. Therefore the question before the House is simply this—as no bill which we can pass will operate upon the present Congress—shall we, during this Congress, put the Delegate from Oregon upon an equal footing with us, or shall we permit this exception to stand against him? Because, of course, when that bill comes from the Committee on Mileage, it will operate upon all prospectively alike—upon him as well as the rest of us—and we only ask that he may, until such a bill can be operative, be placed upon an equality with the rest of the House, those included who come from the same coast with himself—from the Pacific. The Delegate from Oregon comes from a country where—if I may be permitted by the gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] to refer to his argument—electioneering may cost quite as much as in that State, and be attended with personal risk and exposure equally as great, while the distance from thence to this city and the expense of the journey, are still greater.

Mr. Speaker, I regretted exceedingly to see the activity exhibited on the part of some members, in opposition to this bill. It calls up reminiscences which are by no means pleasant. I recognize amongst one or two of the most active—not to say noisy—opponents of the bill, gentlemen who have been extremely active heretofore in debate—in another Congress—in procuring or attempting to procure, a change in the mileage law; gentlemen who were candidates during the first session of that Congress for reelection, and were reelected during the recess, and who during the second session of that Congress waited upon members of the Committee on Mileage, and insisted—after they had previously demanded that a report should be made in their favor for a limited number of miles—upon being placed upon an equality with other members. I will name no gentleman, because the reports of that committee, which are in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, will show who they are. By comparing these reports, a wide distinction will be found to exist between the amount of mileage received at the first and the second session of the last Congress, by certain members who were reelected during the recess between those two sessions. I say that these members, after asking as a favor that the Committee on Mileage should report them entitled only to mileage for a limited number of miles, and after this committee had consented to make an exception to the general rule in their behalf, because they asked not for an increase, but diminution of the mileage to which, by law, they would be entitled, came subsequently to that same committee and demanded to be put upon an equality with other members, and that their mileage should be computed, in the language of the law, "by the most usual road," although in one or two instances this computation would make it double the mileage of the previous session. That course shows the sincerity of their present professions in favor of the reduction of mileage, when that deduction shall operate to the prejudice of one man, and one man only. I should not have made this allusion—and I regret that it became my duty to do it—had it not been for the fate of this bill—a fate produced in a great degree by their active exertions in opposition to it. Now, sir, if the reason which they urged, and urged properly before the Committee on Mileage, was correct in their case, why is it not correct in the case of the Delegate from Oregon? They asked no more than was right under the law. They asked that their mileage should be computed by the "most usual road," although it was double the amount they received at the first session of that Congress, which amount had been fixed at their own request. The short mileage, for which they were so solicitous during the first session, had probably been made to answer its purpose—they could see no personal reason for its continuance. They urged the increase because the law allowed it them; and the law does allow it. Their then reason in their own case, is a strong one in favor of this bill, and refutes their opposition to it. In this case I grant that a special law applies to the Delegate from Oregon. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] urged that the Delegate was elected under that law, and therefore that he ought to be allowed only the mileage specified in it. But the Delegate knew not that the law was in force. He knew only that his predecessor had drawn mileage under another law, and that he received a much greater amount than that which the special law, which we are now endeavoring to repeal, would have given him. He knew that, and expected the same in his case. But this special law meets the committee in the face, and they cannot give him the mileage to which the law entitles the Representatives from California, and every other member upon this floor. I have said, and permit me to repeat it again, that I am not the advocate of the law of 1818, and I trust that gentlemen will see that the proposition which has just been lost has nothing whatever to do with the desired modification of that law. It is simply a question of justice between us and one of our associates upon this floor. Will you continue the law thus discriminating against him? Although that law was in force when he was elected, I am convinced the Delegate from Oregon did not know or believe that it was. Will you continue it in force against him to his prejudice? I will say, in justice to him, that he cares little for the amount involved in dollars and cents, but much for the principle of discrimination against himself. Will you continue it, and thereby declare to the world your intention to reform at the expense of a single member? Or will you, by its repeal, put him upon an equal footing with the rest of us, and then walk up to the support of a bill which will be reported from the Committee on Mileage, equalizing the mileage of all?

[Here a message was received from the Senate, at the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary.]

Mr. SWEETSER, (interrupting.) I am induced to ask my friend from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] to yield the floor a moment, in order that there may be no misunderstanding in relation to the allusions made by him. It will be recollected that I served with my friend from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] during the first session of the last Congress, upon the Committee on Mileage. I had the honor to submit to this House and advocate a resolution for the purpose of instructing that committee to compute the mileage upon the nearest mail route, where there were public conveyances. That resolution met with the fate of all the other propositions I had the honor to introduce and advocate upon this floor, to reduce mileage, and it was laid upon the table. And at the last session of the last Congress, I was inquired of by a gentleman, whether it would be agreeable to me if I were left off from that Committee on Mileage, knowing it came from the Speaker? Feeling that I had done my duty faithfully upon that question, I answered no, it would not. I then made up my mind that all efforts in the House of Representatives to reform this—as I consider it—evil, in my judgment would be utterly useless, and I made up my mind never to raise my voice again, while I should have the honor of a seat upon this floor, in favor of fixing this question upon some equitable basis. I think the only remedy to be hoped for is with the people. I did not act upon that committee during the last session of the last Congress, and I now desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH], and to the country, that my mileage was computed precisely the same as I had the honor to compute it at the previous session; and I submit to the gentleman whether he will not exonerate me from the suggestion which he has made?

Mr. FITCH. Certainly I do. I made no allusion to my friend, [Mr. SWEETSER.] As to the difference which may or may not exist between his mileage at the second session, I do not allude to it, because I do not know. I refer to the matter in general terms.

Mr. SWEETSER. At this session the chairman of the Committee on Mileage addressed a circular to me, following the precedent set by that committee during the last Congress. I answered him by referring to the statement I had made at the first session of the last Congress, in order that I might be perfectly right upon the question. I know perfectly well, that the point the gentleman makes here will tell upon some gentlemen in this House, and I have no objection that it should. I do not know who they are. I desire to be understood at this and at all times in relation to this question, so far as I am concerned, that I have no change to make, in this or in any other Congress. I believe there should be some equitable arrangement made in relation to the question of mileage. I regret that I have taken any part in opposing the measure for the relief of the honorable gentleman from Oregon. I entertain for that gentleman the most kind feelings, and would be glad to do him any act of kindness in my power, but I cannot vote to increase his mileage. I return my thanks to my friend [Mr. FITCH] for permitting me to make this explanation.

Mr. FITCH. A difference in several cases will be found between the reports of the Committee on Mileage for the first and second sessions of the last Congress. A part of these changes were of a limited character, and appeared to be rendered necessary because of information which was obtained by the committee, either with or without inquiry, of errors in previous reports. The statements of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] may be correct for aught I know to the contrary. In his case I do not know what action was had. I have already remarked that I will not designate the individuals, if any now have the honor of holding a seat upon this floor, who chose to pursue the course I have alluded to in asking changes of their mileage, because the reports themselves will show who they were.

The gentleman from Ohio last up said that if he could reconcile it to his sense of duty to vote for the bill to extend the same rights of mileage to the Delegate from Oregon accruing to others under the law of 1818, he would cheerfully do so. If it is wrong to extend it to this Delegate, it was wrong to extend it to his predecessor. There were no objections made then. There was not a voice raised in opposition when it was proposed to give him the mileage he drew, and which was much greater than the amount which, under the existing law, the present Delegate will obtain. The economy advocated by the opponents of the bill under discussion manifests itself at the expense of only one of the two hundred and thirty occupying a seat upon this floor. We propose to take from him a small sum to which, under the law governing the mileage of the rest of us, he would be entitled. Cannot the economical hawks of the House strike at better game than that? at sums of greater magnitude? They should not stoop to an amount like this, and especially when it is to be obtained from one man only, and at the expense of the violation of a principle which is left operative in the case of every other member. The proposition is merely to give to him the benefit of the provisions of the same law which extends to the rest of us. I should be pleased, sir, if these or any remarks I could submit would have any effect whatever in persuading members to do justice in the case.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I would inquire of the gentleman, what was the action of the House with relation to the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon at the last session? I have never seen it.

Mr. FITCH. The provision in reference to the Delegate from Oregon and Representatives from California, was put into a certain appropriation bill, extending, of course, by the construction usually given to such bills, to that year only. By and under such provision, he drew mileage by the overland route. Any amendment to the annual appropriation bill is construed to expire with the expiration of the year for which the appropriation was provided. Of course, then, the amendment to which I have referred in relation to the Delegate from Oregon expired with the termination of that fiscal year, and of its benefit his successor cannot avail himself. We propose now merely to make that provision continuous, which in the case of the previous Delegate was limited to one year, or at least to make it continue until the law of 1818 shall be remodeled.

Mr. McMULLIN. I happened not to be present when the vote was taken upon the bill now under consideration, in reference to which there is now pending a motion to reconsider. It is a matter of great regret that Congress should be annoyed session after session upon this question. There has not, I believe, been a session for the last ten years but what members have been annoyed by the subject of mileage. What do gentlemen expect to effect by it? Do certain gentlemen mean to make capital for Buncombe, or do they desire in good faith to equalize the pay of the members of Congress. The time of that committee could not be better occupied than by taking under consideration this subject of mileage, and bringing in a bill to equalize the pay of members of Congress. But in reference to the question now before the House, I must be permitted to say that the distinguished Delegate for whose especial benefit it is intended to provide, must have known full well the action of Congress when he became a candidate for a seat upon this floor. It is my misfortune, in common with others, not to be versed in constitutional law, or upon legal questions generally. I confess I thought that the act of the last Congress was to be general. I had supposed that the action of the last Congress was to be final and that that would be an end of this question. In that opinion it appears, however, that I was mistaken. The time of this House has been occupied some two or three days upon the matter of mileage. It is utterly impossible for the existing law regulating the mileage to operate justly and equitably. I could single out individuals here and show the inequality of this law. I could take the honorable gentleman from Tennessee and two of his colleagues, [Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. WATKINS,] who, with myself, come here, traveling a distance of some four hundred or five hundred miles, which requires four or five days to make the trip; while there are other members who come more than double the distance in less time and receive double the mileage that either of us receive; yet we are not disposed to complain. I am not complaining; but it is those who have chosen to leave the States and to emigrate to Oregon and California and elsewhere. It is the good fortune of those gentlemen to be so remotely situated from the seat of Government. The amount that can be saved from the mileage will settle them advantageously upon the lands of the Government. They can make valuable settlements there. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is proper, right, or just—if gentlemen desire to deal out even-handed justice to each man of the House—that one member shall receive a small fortune by way of mileage and per diem, and another get an inconsiderable sum? Can you do justice under the existing law regulating mileage? I say you cannot. What was the state of the country at the passage of the mileage law compared to what it is at the present day? Why, then members of Congress traveled here upon horseback; and now we have the advantages of the railroad, steamboat, and other conveniences; and hence at that time the law operated more equitably than it does at present. I concur fully with the views of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] If I understand that gentleman correctly, he proposed an amendment to this bill to give to members of Congress a fixed compensation. I would not stand up here and tell my constituents that I would refuse to pay a member of Congress just and ample compensation. No, sir, I would not act the demagogue in any such way. The pay of members of Congress is little enough; and I say now, if the Committee on Mileage will take this matter into consideration, and introduce a bill to give a fixed compensation to members—say a salary of $2,000—I will go for it, although I have been informed that members who voted for such a law some years ago were not returned again. If such a vote as that will gain the displeasure of my constituents, the sooner my political race is run the better. I represent no such people. I say that it is not only important to members of Congress, but it is important to the public business of the country, that you should make the pay of members of Congress equal, as far as it is practicable to do so. I shall vote against the reconsideration of the bill. If the bill is reconsidered, I shall vote against it; because, sir, I hold that the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, for whose especial benefit this bill is passed, has no right to complain of my vote; for when he was elected to a seat upon this floor, he should have inferred that his mileage was not to exceed $2,500, as provided in the organization of the Territory of Oregon. It was not my purpose to have discussed the vote I intend to give. My design was to bring the debate to a close upon this mileage question, which is continually rising up as a source of annoyance. I will close my remarks, therefore, by calling for the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. That is not fair.

Mr. PARKER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me a moment.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will withdraw my call for the previous question, as gentlemen seem to suppose that it was not fair. Or I will retain the floor, yielding to the gentleman, and intending after he has concluded, to move to lay the subject upon the table.

Mr. POLK. There are many gentlemen who desire to reply to the gentleman's able argument, and I hope he will yield the floor unconditionally.

Mr. McMULLIN. At the request of the gentleman, I will do so.

Mr. PARKER, of Indiana. On yesterday, when this question was first presented, I did not expect to make a remark. But I do not feel that it is my duty now to sit still under the circumstances of the case, and allow the vote to be taken without giving expression to a few thoughts. I am satisfied that this legislation for supposed emergencies in a matter of this kind is wrong. This is the evil that will always attend us in such cases until remedied; and it can be remedied only by general enactment, applicable alike to us as well as the Delegate from Oregon.

When the organic law of that far-off Territory, as it was then regarded, was made, we little dreamed that we should now be legislating as we are side by side with the men of California, of Utah, and New Mexico. But so it is; here we all are. And Oregon is with us; but she has not come, she cannot come, like us, unless you pass this bill.

We have already spent in value time enough of this House upon this bill, and the existing law in discussing this question, to much more than cover the increased compensation that will ever accrue from the passage of this bill. And it will be always so, so long as we adopt this kind of local and special and invidious legislation. * This is all wrong, it seems to me, for us sitting here as we do in the attitude of national legislators. There is the wrong; and it goes back to that organic law which established this difficulty. And it has, I understand, been haunting us ever since. We might have expected then what has been the history of this case since, that whenever your appropriation bills come up, the question would come up about putting the Delegate from Oregon upon the same footing with other members upon this floor—treating him as the rest of us are treated; because every heart responds at once and says it is right. The true question is not whether the Delegate deserves less or as much as this bill gives him, but it is, Should the rule that governs the rest of us govern him? It will be always so, whether we pass this bill or not, that every honest mind will say there is no reason for making the mileage of the Oregon Delegate less than his from Utah and New Mexico and the members from California, when he makes a much longer and more perilous journey than they. If we pass this bill, however, we have settled the question; we are not disturbed with it any longer as an isolated question; and the sooner it comes up in common with the case of each one of us upon this floor, the better it will be for the country; for this question is one about which the public mind is particularly restive. It will be restive until we provide for it, and we should do it. But it is never to be done in this sideling sort of way. I am for passing this bill for the purpose, if no other, of getting rid of this question at this time; for in the first place, we can only get rid of it by passing this bill; and I tell gentlemen here, whether they are political friends of mine or opponents—and the gentleman for whose benefit this bill is introduced is no political friend of mine, and never has been—I tell gentlemen of all parties, if our object be economy, we will have to pass this bill, for either this bill, or some other application in a different form, will come up that will cause us more—ten times more, peradventure—than is involved here. For this character of legislation is wrong. The mileage law which exists now should not be—cannot be —remedied in detail, but must be remedied by a general bill. Where is the man upon this floor, I care not from what part of the country he comes, that would submit to be laid upon the Procrustean bed of this special legislation, and have himself measured off, and cut off, if perchance he were fancied to be a little too long, and drawn out a little, if too short. The legislation is certainly wrong. It looks to me, with due respect for honorable gentlemen and deference to the House, that it is ignominious—for we are all equals—we should so treat each other, and be treated. It is said, however, in reference to my friend from Oregon, that he accepted his seat under this law as it is, and therefore he has no right to complain. Has he complained? Has he opened his mouth in reference to this case? No, sir; no, sir; nor would he if he remained here until the resurrection gun is fired. I have known that gentleman in other days. I have known him in civil as well as in military life, and he is among the last of men that you will ever hear complaining in a case of this kind. It is his friends here, who know his high deserving, and see this invidious legislation standing against him, that come forward and complain of the manner in which he is treated. Inasmuch, however, gentlemen still tell us, as he accepted this position under the law as it is, we should hold him to it. Now, I appeal to my political friends here if they are disposed to mete out that kind of dealing to the gentleman under these circumstances? Could we look with any degree of complacency upon such treatment as that towards a gentleman of our school—one by us deemed worthy of our kindest regards, and that gentleman now standing in the attitude this one does? I have seen too much of human nature—I cannot think so; no, sir. Did he belong to the same political church, make his devotions in the same temple of worship with us, where would we be then? I know full well where we would be. If one of ours had come from that far-off region with his life in his hand—with signal military honors crowned—as well as with civic wreaths upon his brow, as this Delegate has come, I cannot mistake where our hearts and our heads would be. There is hardly one of us upon this floor, I doubt whether there is any, who would say of that brother of ours anything else than that he ought to be put in the same predicament with all other members. This is the view I have of the matter. I have felt so in other days—so have my opponents; I feel so now, and so do they. Look you, again, at this thing. Because he accepted it under these circumstances, therefore he is to be held to it—he is so bound! There is no reason, no justice, no logic in a Shylock-argument of that character, in my humble judgment. I know my friend full well. What I say for him, I believe I may say for nine tenths of the population of the little Territory on the Pacific slope—little in numbers yet, but magnificent in prospect—if there were no mileage here at all, suffering as they have and do, there is that number to be found there who would come here for higher and purer motives than money, had they the ability, and act for that Territory. This gain to him in money was not thought of when he came here, or thought of by him when he was elected. He has given evidence enough to the country, that he has a heart, and kind of gallantry about him—a love of country, that would have induced him to have acted gratuitously in the whole matter, had it been required at his hands, and he able to do so. It seems to me that this ought to be satisfactory to us. This is the first time in the whole history of the country, that we have had a law of the kind, which by this bill we seek to abrogate. It is well it has been so, for had it been otherwise, I cannot be mistaken in supposing that we would have had all these difficulties every session of Congress since its enactment that we have now, and will have, until this wrong is remedied.

I know very well, as I have already indicated, there are great outrages connected with these mileage transactions, and, as I stated, the country is all alive in reference to the matter, and it ought to be remedied. The country calls for it, and we should respond without delay. It can never be remedied, however, in the form of the old law—the legislation we now seek to remedy, but aggravates the difficulty, and we only make ourselves ridiculous, it seems to me, with due deference, when we attempt it. Let us wipe that out, and go zealously to work and remedy the whole evil enveloping each one of us, and then, and then only, will the country be quiet. It seems to me, then, that the upshot of the whole matter is, if we get rid of the present difficulty, we must pass this bill. And as the whole question now stands, it is right and proper that it should be done.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am one of the members who voted against the passage of this bill. I believe this whole subject of mileage demands revision, and I am of the opinion that the amount of mileage which has been fixed for the Delegate from Oregon is sufficient in any case; and that our business and object now should be rather to equalize the mileage of other members than to raise it in that case. I am not convinced by the arguments which have been introduced by the gentlemen upon the other side, and certainly not by any which have been presented by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PARKER.] I do not believe that the members upon this side of the House would be influenced to vote differently were the gentleman whose mileage is in question here, a member of their party. I will not be judged in that manner. It has been said that whoever declares all men to be scoundrels, at least proves that there is one. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] may measure others by his own feelings of what he would be constrained to do; but I apprehend that would not be the way in which gentlemen ought to be judged. I believe there are gentlemen upon the other side who have viewed this matter as we do. This has been no party view. It has been no party question; and it should not be so. The question is, whether we shall repeal this law, and thereby raise the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon; and whether it is sufficient as it is now. It seems to me that $2,500 is enough to pay, and amply pay any man who lives in any part of this Union for his traveling expenses, and for his coming to the capital. I have no question that many members are over paid—extravagantly paid—and I would desire this House to take the matter in hand, to equalize the mileage, and to make it what it should be. I am altogether opposed to any measure or any vote which shall have a tendency to increase the mileage of a single member of this House.

Mr. HEBARD. I am one of the members of this House who voted against the bill under consideration. I hold the privilege, with other members of the House, of voting according to the dictates of my conscience; nor do I hold myself amenable to any other gentleman upon the floor, to call in question the right or propriety of that vote. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] was entirely beyond his own jurisdiction, or any right he has as a member upon this floor, in undertaking to take members to task as to the propriety of their votes, and applying to the action of this House, or the action of a past Congress, the term ignominious. He must be left to the exercise of his own taste in relation to the terms he uses. I do not know but what it is in accordance with the taste of that gentleman. In my estimation, however, he is branding opprobrious epithets upon the laws of this country—upon the action of this body, which he is not entitled to use. He is exercising an immunity beyond his right. I do not know what right that gentleman has to say that the members of this House, in giving their votes, place themselves in a ridiculous attitude. I do not know what there is peculiar about this bill more than others, which should call for the exercise of any such language, or justify any such liberties, by any member of this House. The vote may be right, or it may be wrong. I take it, where the question is so nearly balanced as it is here, that there is some excuse for any gentleman who shall give his vote, even if he does differ from some other gentleman. It has been said here in relation to this law, that it is placing this mileage principle in an unjust position. I do not know what injustice there is about it. I have not heard one gentleman, who has undertaken to show that the pay given to this Delegate from Oregon was not an equivalent for the services he renders here. But they say he does not get as much as some other persons. Does that make it unjust? The organic law of that Territory, which gave him a right to represent that people here, fixes his compensation. He was elected under that law, and came here under that law. Is there anything unjust about that? I have not heard gentlemen explain what they mean by the injustice of the law. Everything was regular in reference to it. It was a mere act of Congress by which he came here at all. There has been no deception, no imposition practiced at all. But the gentleman says, the Delegate is not complaining. I do not know why gentlemen are so forward in their complaints, when they say the Delegate himself, who is the person to be affected by their action, is not himself complaining. If he is satisfied, I do not know why gentlemen should get up and undertake to read us a lecture upon dereliction of duty, when the person who is to receive the benefit of our act is himself satisfied with the law as it is. Gentlemen say, that it is a discrimination between this case and others. The case itself makes the discrimination, and it is not the law which makes it. The law has only applied itself to the case as it is. All of us admit here, that there is a great inequality—an unreasonable inequality in the compensation of members, growing out of the mileage; and the further the individual is removed from the seat of Government, the greater is the inequality. That is the reason why the law has provided for this case of the Delegate of Oregon. The distance being so great, it would be monstrous that he should come under the same rules fixing his mileage, as a member living within one or two hundred miles of the capital. I hold that there is no injustice, nothing wrong in it; and while gentlemen say the whole system is wrong, I say where is the propriety, when we have made one single advance, however small it may be, towards correcting an evil, in going back again to the point whence we started, for the purpose of making the evil still worse than it now is?

This House, I believe, did pass a bill at the last Congress, but it did not become a law—a bill dictated by the sense and judgment of the House, and rendered necessary by the circumstances of the case—by which all the members of this House, whether Representatives of States or Delegates from Territories, living at the other side of the Rocky Mountains, were to receive no more than a certain compensation, and that was $2,500. It was said, by the last Congress, that $2,500 was sufficient compensation for any gentleman living the other side of the Rocky Mountains. It was considered by the last Congress that $2,500 was sufficient compensation to the Delegate from Oregon, whoever he might be. I do not think, under the circumstances—knowing the circumstances under which Congress then acted—that that law is to be characterized by gentlemen here as being ignominious.

If there is any further legislation necessary to place the Delegate from Oregon upon a footing with others, let us not go back and disturb this law, which has made a commencement in the direction, which all say is the right one, but let us follow it up in other cases.

Gentlemen seem to suppose, that upon the passage of this bill quiet will be restored upon this subject of mileage. Why, it seems to me only a renewal of the agitation on the subject. The mileage of members of Congress has been the subject of complaint and of severe remark, and always will be while the inequality is kept up. I believe it will not be any more easy matter to reconcile this whole subject after having placed this back again, than if we were to start from this point, if anything has been gained, and all seem to admit that something has been.

Gentlemen talk about the great expense of getting elected to Congress, and think that they ought, therefore, to have very large compensation. I do not know that we ought to listen to such arguments as that. It does not always follow—although it may be the case at present—that the member or delegate who lives furthest from the seat of Government should, therefore, receive the largest compensation, as the one whose election will cost him the most. It may be so now, but it certainly is not so always, and therefore that consideration cannot be taken into account for the purpose of judging of the reasonableness of the law, or the amount of the compensation. I do not believe it is very good policy either, to foster the idea that we are, by means of compensation, to hold out inducements to persons who may become candidates for election here to make use of very extraordinary means to obtain that election.

I am satisfied that the deliberate sense of this House has been expressed in the vote taken this morning, and which it is now proposed to reconsider. I believe that a majority of the House have by that vote given a candid and praiseworthy expression of their judgment upon this question, without being at all affected by any political or party considerations. As has been very well and properly remarked, it has not been a party vote, and a question of this sort never should be. It is a question that never can at different times affect parties in the same way. It may affect one political organization favorably to-day and another to-morrow.

Sir, I trust that after the discussion and deliberation that has been had upon this subject on yesterday and to-day, and the opportunity that has been afforded gentlemen to make up their minds thoroughly, we shall not now wheel about and change the result, merely because there may be, perhaps, with some individuals a disposition to find fault and cavil and complain of the result because they think it is going to affect one of their friends unfavorably. I trust the vote thus deliberately taken and recorded will be permitted to stand.

Mr. HALL. I think this question has been sufficiently discussed, and I therefore move the previous question.

[Loud cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. HALL. If the gentleman from Georgia desires to make any remarks I will withdraw it.

The demand for the previous question was then withdrawn.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish to offer a few observations in reply to the gentleman from Indiana first up, [Mr. Fitch,] and also to the gentleman from Indiana last up, [Mr. PARKER.] The friends of this bill demand its passage upon the allegation that the existing law is unjust. That is the only argument or the only statement which I have heard made by them. I lay out of the account the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PARKER,] that the bill ought to be passed in order to save the time of the House. A little more experience in this House will show that gentleman that he is mistaken, and that the absence of discussion here does not facilitate adjournments. The most harmless time which is spent by the House of Representatives, he will find, is that spent in discussion. I lay out of the account, also, the argument made by the gentleman upon the personal merits of the sitting member from Oregon. I doubt not that they are as great as he represents them to be, but that is not a legitimate consideration in this question. I lay out of the account the charges made by the other gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Fitch,] against certain members of this House respecting their course upon this subject before and after their elections. It may be true or not true as regards those gentlemen, but it cannot affect this question at all. Whether certain gentlemen took one course with reference to mileage before their elections and another after, does not show this law to be unjust, and it is for those who stand in that category to defend themselves. These are mere outside influences that are brought up to affect this question.

When the bill organizing the Territory of Oregon passed this House, the mileage of no member of the House went as high as $2,500. That sum was beyond the mileage paid to any member of this House, and Congress limited the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon to $2,500. It was not unjust then, unless it was inadequate; and its injustice therefore must be based entirely and exclusively upon its inadequacy. I will demonstrate, that if there was injustice, the injustice was upon more than half the members of this House. Subsequently California was admitted into the Union, and the mileage of its Representatives was also limited by this House, but the limitation was rejected by the other House; and the same was the case with respect to the Territory of Utah.

Well, the House fixed that limitation because it believed that after the payment of traveling expenses, it left sufficient salary. It left more salary than was given to two thirds of all the members of this House, and I say that it does to-day; after deducting traveling expenses, it leaves more salary now, out of this mileage, than is paid to two thirds of the members of this House. Where, then, is the injustice? Why, it seems to be based upon the fallacious idea that it is unjust because three or four gentlemen in this House get more by a different rule—that is, by the law of 1818. Now, all seem to admit that the law of 1818 works unequally and unjustly. These very gentlemen themselves say so, and yet we are asked to go back to a rule acknowledged to be wrong, as a measure of justice. Both the gentlemen from Indiana say that the rule adopted by the act of 1818 is wrong. The gentleman from Indiana over the way [Mr. Fitch] told the House that he was chairman of the Committee on Mileage of the last Congress, and endeavored to correct that wrong, but failed; and now he asks that you shall go back to a rule which he has himself declared to be wrong.

But the injustice seems to be based on the idea that there are three or four members on this floor who receive more mileage than the Delegate from Oregon. If his compensation is sufficient and just of itself, is it unjust because you do not give him what other members get, and what this House has repeatedly declared to be unjust? That is a most singular system of reasoning.

Mr. STUART, (interposing.) Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to say, that I find upon inquiry that one of the members from Texas receives between twenty-four and twenty-five hundred dollars, and the other three thousand dollars.

Mr. TOOMBS. That very bill of limitation, limited all on this side of the Rocky Mountains to $1,500. If one of the members from Texas gets $3,000, you only state another case of grosser injustice. That is all. Well, I do not see how you can remove injustice by multiplying unjust cases; yet that is what you propose to do.

Mr. STUART, (interrupting.) My idea is, that the man who travels five hundred miles—the facilities being nearly alike—makes as much proportionate profit on his mileage, as the man who travels five thousand miles. Every member's mileage is calculated on the principle of so many cents per mile. Now I ask the gentleman from Georgia, to show the House how this rule is right up to four hundred or a thousand miles, and becomes so radically wrong when you get up to three or five thousand miles.

Mr. TOOMBS. I say that the principle is wrong; that it is not a correct principle. It is much more difficult to come to this House from the western part of Texas, both in expense and physical suffering and risk—if they are to enter into the consideration—than it is to come from San Francisco. Every gentleman knows that. It does not depend entirely upon distance, but then, on account of the distances, and the expansion of the limits of the Republic, and the facilities for traveling in this country, the compensation having been always more than sufficient to pay traveling expenses, it has become an important and material item of salary. The House, therefore, said that when a man could come from San Francisco for $300, and return for $300, he should only have $1,000 as salary. A great many members get no salary at all. In some cases, on account of the difficulty of traveling, it is only half of the mileage; in others it is not five per cent. It is a mistaken idea, that we can correct injustice by making the act of 1818 the rule, which is itself an unjust rule. There is the difficulty.

Now if $2,500 is just compensation for a Delegate from the western coast of America, it is not unjust because there are two other gentlemen here from that portion of the Republic who receive $5,000, because that has been repeatedly declared by the House to be unjust and improper compensation. Why is it unjust not to make another such case? That is what you ask us to do.

Mr. PARKER, of Indiana, (interrupting.) The gentleman has misstated my position—of course, unintentionally. The rule is unjust. It is just that the gentleman from Georgia should receive the mileage that he does now, because the rest of us receive the mileage that we do. But if we received the mileage that we ought to receive, his mileage would be unjust. The rule is wrong; and my objection to the special law in relation to the Delegate from Oregon is this, that you have taken him from under the operation of the unjust rule and made special legislation in regard to him. We ought to legislate in regard to the whole, and not in regard to individual cases.

Mr. TOOMBS. I agree with the gentleman. But the very fact that this case is the only one that has been taken out from under the unjust rule, makes it a just case, and the gentleman therefore wishes to overturn the only just case. According to his argument, we must go backwards. That is progressing with a vengeance! Not having been able, on account of the conflict of interests in this House and elsewhere, to establish a rule of justice, but only to do partial justice by taking this case from under the unjust rule, we must now reverse that partial justice and do universal wrong!

Mr. PARKER, of Indiana, (interrupting.) Does the gentleman think it just that we should take the gentleman from Oregon, and make him an exception to the rule, whether just or unjust?

Mr. TOOMBS. I hold that an approximation to justice, or to a remedy for injustice, is right, whether it offends me or anybody else. This brings me to another portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana. There is a certain class of economists in this House which I have observed for the last five or six years, who will favor any measure coming from whatever source, by which they can cut off wrong or extravagant expenditures. But there is another class who are always preaching economy—who are always ready to apply the rule of economy, and get economical upon every case except the one before the House. They say, Why go over yonder and take that case—take any case—any bill except this one, and I will be with you.

Mr. FITCH. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia, if he did not vote for the Galphin claim?

Mr. TOOMBS. I did, sir, and I consider voting for just claims as one of the highest duties of a statesman, and I shall continue to vote for such claims as long as I hold a seat upon this floor. I would scorn that economy which withholds justice from a public claimant on account of public clamor.

Mr. FITCH. That is precisely what I am contending for. I do not want to make an unjust discrimination against the honorable gentleman from Oregon, even if the practice is wrong. Let it apply to all alike.

Mr. TOOMBS. Well, sir, this class of economists are always ready to cover up their own iniquities, their extravagance, and their blunders, by running down even just claims which the Government are bound to pay. That is a part of my experience here. They have intimidated some, but they have not others, and they never will. These are the economists who, when they are candidates for election, you cannot name a resolution for economy that they will not vote for. But when they come here, in this House, and any proposition for retrenchment comes up, then they will say, this is a small matter; why trouble the House about such small matters, when there is so much worthy of pruning by the House? These are the economists who always preach economy, but never vote for a proposition for removing a matter of abuse, no matter how clear it may be. Now, I take it that the best place to begin this reform is in this House. It will arm us with a moral power to reduce the already increased and constantly increasing expenses of this Government. Put it right here, and then you will be able to effect retrenchments in other branches of the Government, without the fear of the abuses in this House being brought up in judgment against you, in the hustings and elsewhere. That is the trouble about it.

Now, in relation to this compensation, I am in favor of holding on to all we have got in the way of retrenchment, and of gaining all we can. I believe this maximum which has been established is a just one. It gives this Delegate a compensation which, in my judgment, is doing him better justice than is done to a majority of the members of this House. I am in favor of fixing the compensation of members upon a just ground. I believe a majority of gentlemen upon this floor regard it as too little. I have voted, and am ready to vote to increase it. But I desire that it shall be fixed upon just and equitable principles. That is my principle of economy. I am not for fixing the lowest salaries; but I believe this question ought to be fixed permanently by the House. I wish to increase these cases exceptional to the general rule, as the means of bringing about general justice. You have got one case—keep it! It is not unjust. It is not unfair. The compensation is enough. Bring down the others within the rule—one at a time, if you can—all at once, if you can; but stand by what you have gained, if you honestly intend to be economical in this matter.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I regret that this question was not brought before the House in its true shape; then we would understand how to vote upon it.

I understand the question before us to be this: By the organic law of Oregon, passed several years ago, that Territory became entitled to a Delegate upon this floor, who, upon coming here, was to receive the pay of a member, and for mileage $2,500. Under that organic law, a gentleman was appointed as Governor of that Territory, and that gentleman was supposed to know that law. I understand that he was the same gentleman who now occupies a seat upon this floor as Delegate from that Territory. It has been insinuated that he did not know of such a law. Now, that gentleman has acted as Governor of Oregon, and I do not suppose—

Mr. FITCH. I did not insinuate that the gentleman from Oregon did not know of such a law. I said the Delegate to the last Congress from that Territory [Mr. Thurston] came here under the same law, and yet received much more than $2,500; and I intimated that he might have justly supposed that some law had been adopted subsequently making such provision as allowed a greater compensation than $2,500.

Mr. STEVENS. Ah! Then he did not know what were the laws of his own Territory! He did not know but the organic law had been changed! I cannot presume so much upon the ignorance of the gentleman who represents that respectable portion of the country. I have no doubt that he came here knowing the law of his Territory, for he was bound to know it. He came here as a Delegate for $2,500 mileage. Now when he came here the first of December last, he was entitled to, and had a vested right to that mileage, and the Government had a vested right to his services for that mileage and his pay. Here were two vested rights. He was entitled to it; and now do you want to give him more? Do you want to give a gratuity to that Delegate? If you do, bring in a fair bill. Say it is enacted by this Congress that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make a gratuity to General Lane—I believe that is his name—of $4,000. For what? Why the gentleman could not stand as well as Galphin did. For nothing—no pretence of services rendered.

Mr. FITCH. Will the gentleman allow me a moment, for it is the only way I can get the ear of the House? What service did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] render this House or the country, while he was away for several weeks of the present session, in defending those who were engaged in a mob which destroyed the lives of our citizens?

Mr. STEVENS. That is the way such gentlemen argue! That is the way such statesmen answer arguments! God forbid that I should ever descend so low as to answer him! Sir, I am here, arguing a question of right, and I mean to argue it as honorably and statesmanlike as I can. I dare say that is the best the gentleman can do with his side of the question, and I leave the House to judge how admirably he has succeeded. [Laughter.]

I was proceeding to say, that you have given General Lane, in this bill, a gratuity of $4,000, (I believe it is between $4,000 and $5,000, if I can calculate it right.) Well, sir, there is no person to whom I would more cheerfully make a present, if I were allowed by my duty to bestow the public money upon those who have not earned it—to give the public money to those who have rendered no service for it. I do not know of any one upon whom it would give me greater pleasure to bestow four or five thousand dollars of the money which does not belong to us—for that is what we are doing—than to General Lane. Let us understand what we are doing. That gentleman has a vested right to the $2,500 mileage which the law allows him, and the Government has a vested right to his service, and you propose to pay him this money out of the public Treasury for nothing but because he is a favorite, and a just favorite, of the nation. For this, you propose to give him four or five thousand dollars. And what excuse has his friends for asking it for him? Why, that the gentleman from California, although he lives nearer to the seat of Government, receives more than he does. I have nothing to say to this. They both came here under the existing laws, and they are fairly entitled to what the laws allow them. Would you take the five thousand dollars to which the gentleman from San Francisco [Mr. MARSHALL] is entitled, because you conceive that it is more than he earned in coming here? No, sir; it is his vested right under the existing laws. But just as little can you take honestly—no, I do not say honestly, for every man acts honestly—but just as consistently can you take two thousand five hundred dollars from the mileage of the gentleman from California as you can add that amount to the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon. You cannot do either. Each party is entitled to his rights, and all beyond that is a gratuity. If the gentleman from California chooses to bestow his money upon the Government, he can do it; and if the Government choose to bestow its money upon General Lane, it can do it, but let it not be done in the name of justice.

Why the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PARKER,] sitting behind, says this was so just a claim, that he believed if the recipient of it were a Whig, that his Whig friends would vote for it. It is a poor compliment to the party of which I understand him to say he is a member. That, it seems, would constitute a principal merit in the case. I hope this insinuation is not just. I hope there are more honest men here than the gentleman, speaks of. When he has associated longer with us, and seen more of us, he will find out that there are more honest men in the Whig or Democratic side of the House than he supposes. I admit, that when we have a party question before the House, that we are apt to go to the very verge of our belief to sustain it. Is this a party question? Is a man to receive a gratuity of $4,000 because he belongs to this side of the House? Who would not be ashamed of himself, if he estimated his own conduct as low as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] does his? Why, I have seen men upon all sides of the House, voting indiscriminately upon this question, some for and some against the bill; and they voted honestly. Some, I know, are so good-natured that they cannot vote against a claim brought up by a friend; some vote against it because they think it is wrong; some for one reason, and some for another. Now, this is my view of it. I do not look upon this as a party or personal question at all. And, in the name of conscience, how can it be sustained by such an argument as was advanced by the gentleman from Indiana? [Mr. PARKER.] I cannot understand that argument. I suppose it must be above my comprehension. What the personal character or conduct of any individual, who goes for or against this bill, has to do with the naked question, it is for others to understand, but not for me.

I rose, not to make a speech. I rose merely to express my views in relation to this bill; and I have said more than I intended. I will not move to lay this motion to reconsider upon the table; but I wish somebody else would do it. I wish to see the matter disposed of.

Mr. STUART. I wish to refer to a few considerations upon this subject, and at the same time I hope that every gentleman will understand that I do it with the utmost respect. This subject of mileage is one which has been talked about, not only a great deal, but which every gentleman who has listened to it will say, has been talked about very earnestly and very sensibly. There are considerations connected with it which will, I apprehend, present difficulties to the mind of any man, and he who thinks that he possesses the abilities to sit down and provide for this pay of members of Congress, and has the power to reach the difficulties surrounding the subject of compensation, has bestowed but little thought upon the subject. Why, sir, as to the argument which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has just alluded to—and I know not with what propriety towards the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER]—I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I intend to recur to it with the utmost good feeling, and to use it not only as a respectful, but as a legitimate argument touching the compensation of members of Congress.

It is known to all, that members of Congress who live within a convenient distance of this Capitol are in the constant habit of attending to their own personal business, be it professional, mechanical, agricultural, commercial, mercantile, or what you please. They not only do it, but they do it to pecuniary advantage. And while I would not allude to any particular case, and would not certainly make a remark that would be construed into anything disrespectful—for I speak only that which we all know—I would say that members upon this floor have been in the constant habit of retiring to their respective places of business and attending to its duties. They are paid for it. It is a matter of pecuniary benefit at the time. And, sir, it is a matter of much importance to gentlemen engaged in certain kinds of business, inasmuch as it enables them to retain that business. A professional man in the law, with a practice of two, three or four thousand dollars a year, if he lives at a distance from this Capitol, and is thus compelled to lock up his office, loses his business. His clients find counsel elsewhere, and when he has finished his duties here, he will find that he has lost his business at home. If he resides at a point so near to this Capitol that he can at convenient seasons go home, keep up his duties, and retain his business, he makes no such sacrifice, pecuniarily, as that made by the member who lives at a distance too remote to enable him to superintend his private affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I avowed myself yesterday willing to vote for any proposition which should be brought forward here, in good faith, for the purpose of equalizing, to a greater extent, the pay of the members of this House. I at the same time expressed my distrust of the effect, practically, of any plan that had been suggested. I continue to avow that in good faith; and whatever may be said in regard to other gentlemen, I trust that I may not be regarded as egotistical, when I say I am willing to meet my constituents, and the world, upon any vote I give here, based upon my judgment, be it right or wrong. If I commit an error, I will make an avowal of it to my constituents, and to the world, and say I am wrong. God knows I will never talk here for Buncombe, and to suit any particular subject. Never. Nor do I believe that other gentlemen are disposed to do it. I think there is a great deal more talk about this subject, than there is reality. It is an honest, fair difference of opinion. As to the pay of members by the mile, I was anxious to hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] upon that subject. Members of Congress are paid so many cents per mile by the existing law. There are gentlemen living in Illinois, in Wisconsin, in Iowa, in Texas, in Missouri, in Arkansas, and in many of those distant States, who receive what would be called a large amount of mileage. When you speak of $1,500, $2,000, or $3,000 as mileage, it is a large sum, and more than any man ought to receive. But that is not the question at all. Is the principle upon which members are paid right or wrong? If it is wrong, do not select the Delegate from the remote Territory of Oregon, as the victim, upon whom to commence this operation of retrenchment and reform. If it is wrong, apply the reform to every member of Congress—go to the foundation of the evil, and cut it up root and branch. Equalize the per diem and mileage. If you cannot do it thoroughly, do it as nearly as you can. But I know of no rule of ethics, which makes it right to pay one man who comes five hundred miles forty cents a mile, and wrong to pay another at the same rate, who comes five thousand miles.

While upon this subject, allow me to correct a misapprehension which I was led into by an inquiry at the office of the Sergeant at-Arms. I made an inquiry and a remark that the member from Texas received $3,000. I was misunderstood in my inquiry, and they answered me in miles, instead of dollars. I believe the largest amount of mileage received by the gentleman coming from the western part of that State, is $2,400. That is a large sum of money in the eyes of many men. The gentleman who comes from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS] thinks that the aggregate mileage paid to all the members should be divided equally amongst them. He does not propose to reduce the sum which the Government pays for mileage, but to divide it up equally among the members. That is the idea of equality entertained upon the part of some members here; and I think it would astonish the people quite as much as the principle that exists now. It would be difficult to determine that the member coming from Maryland, and coming in two hours, should receive an equal amount of mileage as the Delegate who comes from Oregon, a distance of five thousand miles, over a country inhabited by hostile Indians and wild beasts. But I am charitable enough to believe that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr.

EVANS] was not sincere; and I have alluded to these things only for the purpose of showing that when gentlemen rise to talk here so flippantly about equalizing this whole thing, and satisfying everybody, they know but little about it. They would not want, if you were to believe them, more than fifteen or twenty minutes in the committee room to fix and arrange the whole matter. Sir, it would be found to be a work of much greater magnitude than that.

I repeat, I will go with any gentleman here, not only in the work of retrenchment and reform, but of equalization. If gentlemen desire to bring down the pay of members to a grade too low for ordinary capacity, I will never go with them. I like the system of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS], and I will support a plan which shall pay members fairly and liberally; but I will go for equalizing the pay; and I ask gentlemen of this House, in the mean time, and until we shall get up a law which shall affect the whole of us, and operate with uniformity—at least that shall profess so to act—with what propriety do we continue this distinction against the Delegate from Oregon? Whenever a general law is introduced, he will be affected by it.

Now, in regard to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He says there is a contract between the Government of the United States and the Representatives upon this floor. A contract that the Government shall pay the Delegate from Oregon according to the existing law, and that he shall receive such pay and be contented with it. The gentleman also speaks of vested rights. Now, that is going a little further with the doctrine of contracts and vested rights than anything I ever heard of before—a contract that the services shall be given for a consideration! Then does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], and do gentlemen from Maryland, New York, Virginia, Massachusetts, and the surrounding States, carry out that contract in good faith when they go home and attend to their personal business, and draw their per diem here? It is an infringement of the contract; and if you are to carry it out, it would authorize the Government to declare that contract at an end, and such members would be without a seat upon this floor. Sir, I understand that the representative owes his duty to his constituents, and that it is a question to be settled between him and them, whether he does his duties, and is upon this floor a length of time sufficient to discharge those duties to the best interests of his constituents and the country. Let him answer it to his own conscience, and upon his honor, and to them. He is liable and amenable to nobody else.

This mileage was placed originally, as I understand, upon the basis that the Capitol should be here. It was regarded as worth something to this country to have it here—worth something to this locality and the surrounding States; and gentlemen who travel to it, were to be paid so many cents per mile for travel, regardless of the distance. If, in the process of time, and the progress of improvements and facilities in traveling, this system has become wrong, I repeat, lay the axe at the root of the tree; correct the evil at its very basis: let it affect every member here alike; but do not insist upon a discrimination which affects only one member upon this floor. But it is said, that it has peculiar force, because it is found in the organic law of the Oregon Territory. Why, Mr. Speaker, those of us who had seats upon this floor at the time when that act became a law, will agree with me, that we would have voted for it, with any provision that could have been made in regard to the payment of the Delegate, if it had been one thousand, eight hundred, or ten thousand dollars. Such was the feeling of Congress upon that occasion; such was the feeling of the country, and the general demand for the organization for Oregon Territory, that the question of the compensation of the Delegate was not considered for one moment. You might have named any number of dollars, and it would have been adopted with equal facility and with the same number of votes. The great question of organizing that Territory swallowed up all others. There were men in this House who felt opposed to, and I, for one, expressed myself against that restriction at that time. I avowed my determination to vote against it if I could get an opportunity to do so; but, at the same time, I felt as others did, that the question of organizing that territory was a paramount one. Because such were the emergencies of that day, does it constitute any reason for now continuing a thing that was wrong in itself? Why, sir, it will never do to consider this question of mileage abstractly—the thing is right or wrong comparatively. You may say that $2,500 is enough for one man to receive for traveling expenses, and let it be so; but graduate other men's rights accordingly. Let every man stand or fall upon the same principle. I do not see how the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS]—and I concede as much ability to him as any man—has answered my question. But does this principle operate so rightfully when it amounts to a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars, and absolutely wrong when it gets up to three or four thousand dollars. I consider this not only an invidious distinction, but as one beneath the dignity of this House and the Government. I am not amongst the number of gentlemen who believe this Government should be felt only in its power; it should be felt in its mercy, in its generosity, in its magnanimity, and in its justice. I believe, with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD], that there is too much clamor upon this subject, and that we at times are a little too much afraid of maintaining our own dignity, for fear we shall not be sent here to maintain it at all. There is reason, as he says, why a member of Congress should be paid enough to induce him to stay here in the discharge of his duties, instead of asking for a clerkship of a third or fourth rate in the Departments.

Mr. SACKETT. I will make a statement, if the gentleman will permit me, with a view of asking a question, and it is this: A Congress ordinarily sits about twelve months. The fifteen months from the 1st of December of the first session to the end of the next in March, which would give a per diem compensation of $2,920. The average distance of travel is about six hundred miles; taking the whole Congress together, making $1,120 for travel at both sessions, which would give, as the entire compensation of members upon an average, $4,040 for the whole Congress. The Delegate from Oregon, allowing that he does not return during the sessions, which is fair, would make him chargeable with three months' additional service, and a month's additional service for the additional time in traveling, over the other members, which would make his entire service for the two sessions just about seventeen months, and his compensation at the present rate fixed by law—if I am correct as to his being allowed $2,500 for each session—$7,920; while the average of the other members for thirteen months' services is $4,040. Thus the excess of that Delegate's compensation over that of the other members is $3,880. I believe this statement is substantially correct.

Mr. STUART. I do not see how any of these arguments affect the question at all. I have not contended for a moment that the present law regulating the pay of members of Congress operates equally. I concede, and concede cheerfully, that it operates very unequally. I have contended, and I intend to, that it is now based upon a well-ascertained principle, that it is eight dollars per day and so many cents per mile for traveling expenses; and there is no reason why you should discriminate against one man and not against another. I have said, if the system is wrong remodel it; but do not apply it to any one man when it has no application to another. Let us begin so that it will affect us all equally; and I will go with him who goes furthest and most zealously.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. From the commencement of this discussion I have listened, being silent myself. I have voted for this bill in every stage of its progress, and I have heard nothing from any gentleman upon this floor tending to convince me that I have done wrong in thus voting. Now, the only argument I have heard which it seems to me is entitled to the character of one, is that presented by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS]; and it appears to me that the gentleman, upon a reconsideration of it, will admit that while his argument may be a correct one, the premises upon which he bases it are certainly not right. It is true that the gentlemen from California, and from other parts of the country, are paid at the rate of forty cents a mile for the number of miles traveled. He says that it is wrong; but it is according to law. He says that it is right to pay them only $2,500. Now, before I examine the premises as stated by the gentleman, I would ask him this question. I will put this proposition to the House, whether it is not a fundamental principle of justice, that matters of this kind shall be controlled by general and not by special law—whether it is not more important to justice in the abstract, as a question of right, that these things should be established by general laws than by special ones? When you come to the abstract justice and right of the case, I insist that the gentleman's premises in this respect are wrong; and I ask him, by what process of reasoning he arrives at the conclusion that $2,500 is a fairer compensation for traveling expenses from Oregon to the city of Washington and back again, than $5,000? I ask him, by what rule he measures the value of time, the expenses and the danger of that travel which enables him to determine $2,500 as a juster compensation than twice that amount? If his premises be true, and if these things are to be controlled by arbitrary special law, why the gentleman from Georgia might be entitled to receive twice as much as myself. And why? Because his services might be worth twice as much as mine. And why? Because he may be twice as intellectual as I am. He may be twice as illustrious; and if he acts upon the absolute value of services, you may establish a different rule for every man in the House. A special law might be passed fixing the compensation of every man in this House. Are the members of the House prepared to abide by such a rule as this? And now take $2,500, as a just compensation for traveling from Oregon to this country. I ask the honorable gentleman if he would be willing to travel there for it? I say, sir, humble as I am, and humble as I value my own services, if I had no motive of my own, no desire for pleasure, I would not be willing to take that trip for $2,500, and I presume the gentleman would not himself. What were the facts of the case in reference to the predecessor of the gentleman who now occupies the position of Delegate from Oregon? He told us, I believe, that it cost him $1,200 to come from Oregon here for his actual expenses. By an accident to which every one who travels upon that dangerous route is liable, he lost $1,200—that made $2,400 his actual expenses. And in going back he took the Isthmus route, contracted a fever, and lost his life. That is one of the contingencies; and now I think the honorable gentleman from Georgia will admit, that in placing $2,500 as a fair estimate for traveling from California here and back again, he has taken an arbitrary estimate. I should like to know upon what principle he bases it—whether he bases it upon the compensation which he would give to a man in a particular station in life? The lowest station would be willing to travel for half that amount, provided it would pay his expenses, and leave him $10 a month beyond; or whether he placed it upon the compensation which he himself would charge—a gentleman whose service at home is worth double or treble this money? I think there is something arbitrary in his mode of getting at this estimate of $2,500 as a fair compensation.

Mr. TOOMBS. If the gentlemen will allow me a moment, I would put the services of every member of the House upon an equal footing, after deducting the traveling expenses. My rule is, that one member is not worth more than any other member, no matter what his qualifications may be in the House.

Mr. STANTON. I do not pretend to say that it is just, but I do not deem that it is less unjust in the case of California members than it is in the case of the gentleman from Oregon. I say that it operates unequally; and I am ready and willing to go with the gentleman from Georgia to equalize it; but at the same time I do not admit the premises upon which he bases his calculation: and so long as the law exists as it does for the great mass of members, we ought to proceed by general laws, and not make special ones to the injury of particular individuals upon the floor. I say that is a greater departure from justice, upon every principle of right and law as settled in most of the States of the Union, which have in their constitutions, I believe, provided that all the laws shall be general—than any inequality which exists under the operation of the present law. Before I sit down I must be permitted to say, that I listened with great interest and great pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Woodward,] the other day, in reference to the compensation of members of the House. I have never given a vote upon this floor by tellers, or in any other mode, that I have not given likewise upon the yeas and nays; and I am ready to vote now, or at any time, for a bill fixing the compensation of members of Congress at so reasonable a rate that there will be no complaint from any quarter. But until that is done—until you establish something like general justice, I am disposed to proceed according to the general law which fixes the compensation of all the members; for I suppose it will not be contended that the compensation of a Delegate ought to be different from the compensation of any other member of the House. I apprehend that the gentleman from Georgia himself would revolt against a proposition that would put a limitation upon the mileage of one of the members of Congress, elected from one of the States that did not apply to all of the other members.

Mr. POLK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] seemed to imply that some importance had been given to this question from the fact that the Delegate from Oregon was a Democrat. I repudiate any such accusation. I vote for it upon the broad ground of justice; and even if I should vote for it upon the ground of favoritism, there is no gentleman who deserves it more than the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. Lane.] We will take the history of the territorial government of Oregon. We will take it from the hour of the appointment of General Lane as Governor, and trace it to the present hour, and he has done more to relieve that Territory than all the other appliances of Government that have been extended to it. General Lane was appointed Governor of Oregon. He went to Fort Leavenworth, where there was to be a company to escort him to the wilds of Oregon. As the captain was not ready, General Lane, with his usual promptitude and energy, took twenty men and passed through the wilds. When he came to the Frimont Pass, his guide left him and he would wait for no other. His own instinct led him; and he passed into Oregon, visited sixty tribes of Indians, made peace with them, and received no compensation for it. When, in times past, Governors have received compensation, both in the way of their salaries and for arranging Indian treaties, he has never demanded anything from the Government for such services. He has labored there and has redeemed that Territory. He stands here to-day as its Delegate, and yet the representatives of a free people—men who profess to entertain high-toned feelings and sentiments—men who say their honor lives and dashes through their veins—have been found here ready to count the dollars and cents upon him. Shameful! The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] argues this point upon the ground of adequacy. He asks, is it inadequate—is the pay sufficient? Why, I take the ground that it is insufficient. I will take, by way of illustration, the case of the gentleman himself, and apply it to the Delegate from Oregon. I will bring it home to the gentleman. He comes to Washington upon an air-line railroad at forty cents a mile; while the gentleman from Oregon passes through a wilderness, depending alone upon his rifle for subsistence, and he is to be paid ten cents a mile. He is to be cut down. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] intends to make the point of inadequacy, as to the actual expense which is incurred in bringing him to Washington, I ask him if he cannot go from his own home to Washington for $30? I came here for $50, and I have received $900. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] comes here for $30, and receives over $600. If this rule is to operate generously, if it is to operate fairly, I ask him to come up first and make a sacrifice of himself before he offers up the Delegate from Oregon as a sacrifice. Let the principle be carried out; apply it to yourself; do not hug your sweet $600 to your bosom. I am willing to to-day to vote for a bill to square this mileage down to the actual expense. I am unwilling to take this one isolated case to make a sacrifice. The gentleman from Georgia may do it. I scorn to do it. In the history of this case there is another point which strikes me. What has been the action of Congress with regard to this question? When the Oregon territorial bill was passed, there was a feature in it limiting the mileage to $2,500. What was the action of Congress immediately after the passage of that bill? Who was the former Delegate from Oregon? Mr. Thurston. Did he receive $2,500?

No, sir. Was he limited to the operation of the organic law? No, sir. This House, in view of its justice, passed a bill, embodying it in the general appropriation bill, by which they said he should receive $3,400. Now, are you going to make an exception of the present Delegate from Oregon, and draw a distinction between him and the Delegate who preceded him? Is this House ready to say that Mr. Thurston, for his service and labor, shall receive $3,400 mileage, and that the present Delegate from Oregon is only entitled to $2,500? Is it applicable to the present Delegate? No; but the favoritism has been showered upon the Delegate who preceded him. There is one case of injustice. If the gentleman from Georgia wants a case of injustice, that injustice is in this, that you pay a Delegate preceding General Lane $3,400, while you refuse to pay him the same amount. Is there no injustice in that? If there is justice there, I will bow to the gentleman and acknowledge it. I only wish to make my opposition known upon this question. I vote for it, because it is right. I only wish to explain why I shall vote for it. If it is the purpose of the House to cut down the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon to the actual expenditure incurred, I am willing to do it, provided they permit the principle to diffuse itself and apply to all others. If they say I shall receive only the actual expense of traveling from my residence to the Capitol, and let each member go to the Sergeant-at-Arms and make a statement under oath as to his actual expenses, and let that be his mileage, I am willing it should be so. I am unwilling that we should take the mileage we do ourselves, and fall upon one poor Delegate and tear him to pieces.

Mr. ORR. I had not intended to have participated in the debate; but as some consequence has been attached to it by the length of time in which the House has been engaged upon it, I feel it due to myself to state the reasons why I have voted continuously for this bill from the beginning, and against all the motions made to send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to recommit it. I do not pretend to argue as to the justice or injustice of the present system by which members of Congress are paid a compensation. I do not think the present system of mileage is correct. The reason why I vote for this particular bill is, that I am in favor of meting out to the Delegate from Oregon the same justice exactly that is meted out to other members, whether it be just or unjust. I want him to be squared by the same rule by which other members are squared. I think, though, that this whole debate has originated in a misapprehension and misconstruction of the law which was passed the 20th of September, 1850, by the Committee on Mileage. I think, if the proper construction had been given to that law, this debate would not have originated, and this bill would not have been introduced into the House. The act passed upon the 20th of September, to provide for deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of the mileage of members of the House, has a proviso attached to it, which reads:

"Provided, That the mileage of Senators and Representatives from California, and the Delegate from Oregon, be computed according to the most usually traveled route within the limits of the United States, and the per diem of said Senators and Representatives for this session shall commence from the day on which the constitution of California," &c.

The restriction in the latter part of the proviso, which speaks of this session, evidently conveys to the mind the impression that the first part of the proviso was intended to be a general law; and I think I can appeal to such members of this House as were members of the last, that it was the intention of Congress in passing the law, that there should be a fixed and permanent mode adopted for ascertaining the mileage to the California and Oregon members.

Mr. FITCH, (interrupting.) The gentleman from South Carolina has referred to the provision in the deficiency bill of the first session of the last Congress, as one designed to operate prospectively. I do not recollect, of course, what was the intention, if there was any expressed; but I know that the same provision was before the Committee on Mileage during the second session of the last Congress. That committee, with scarcely a dissenting voice, decided that the provision was one temporary in its effect, which had expired with the fiscal year that gave birth to the bill. For the purpose of testing the question, however, they computed the mileage of the representatives from California by the overland route. The gentlemen who were then the Representatives of that State took exception to this computation, and they procured the advice of a gentleman, whose legal attainments I believe are second to those of few in the nation; they obtained a written opinion from him, and with that opinion went to the Presiding Officer of the House. By his advice—I will not say instructions—but by his advice, which the committee deemed worthy of all respect, the committee rescinded its own previous resolution, and permitted those gentlemen to draw their mileage, under the law of 1818, by the Isthmus route.

Mr. ORR. I know that was the construction given by the Committee on Mileage at the last session, and also the construction of the present committee. I take it for granted, however, from the reading of the act, that that construction of the act is incorrect, and that not only is the Delegate from Oregon entitled to his mileage over the overland route to Oregon, but that the members and Senators from California are not entitled to charge by the Isthmus route, but that they are restricted by this act to charge for the same route as that traveled by the Delegate from Oregon.

Well, it is said that this proviso expired with the bill, at the end of the fiscal year, on the 30th of last June. Now, let me call the attention of members to this fact, that at the last session of Congress, there was attached to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill a proviso which provided that bounty land warrants should not be located upon any lands but those that were surveyed at that time; and what was the construction given to that? It was in the general appropriation bill; and if the construction contended for by the Committee on Mileage is correct, it expires also upon the 30th of June next, and all the noise which we have heard in this Hall in favor of repealing that proviso, which it was said had crept clandestinely into the bill, has been unnecessary, inasmuch as it will expire with the bill in which it was incorporated. But it is a mistake. There are very many permanent laws that are incorporated as sections into our general appropriation bills. It is very often the case that things get into the appropriation bills that ought not to be there. I believe the rules of the House require that no appropriation shall be incorporated into a general appropriation bill, unless a prior existing law provides for it. But we all know that clauses creep into the appropriation bills that are not in strict conformity with the rules. I am not sure that offices have not been created by clauses in general appropriation bills, and it has never been contended before that those offices expired with the expiration of the year for which the bill made appropriations.

It is suggested to me that the law abolishing flogging in the Navy was also put into a general appropriation bill. Is the construction to be put upon that, that it expired with the fiscal year for which the appropriations were made? Not at all. It is considered now as one of the general, binding laws of the land, and is so construed by the whole Navy. And it is the same with reference to this bill.

There is some authority upon this subject. I hold in my hand a report made by a committee of the Senate, to whom this subject was referred in March, 1851. Mr. COOPER, from that committee, reported:

"That they have carefully considered the provisions of the aforesaid act, and are of opinion that so much of the same as provides 'that the mileage of the Senators and Representatives from California, and the Delegate from Oregon, be computed and paid according to the most usual traveling route within the limits of the United States,' is permanent; and that the mileage of the Senators from the State of California, should be ascertained and paid in pursuance of this provision."

That, I apprehend, is the right construction. Perhaps that construction has been reversed by the Senate, but I think it is the correct construction of the act.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I think, that upon the very face of this act, the construction contended for by the gentleman from South Carolina cannot be maintained. The provision in the deficiency bill is to this effect:

"Provided, That the mileage of the Senators and Representatives from California, and the Delegate from Oregon, be computed according to the most usual traveling route within the limits of the United States; and the per diem of said Senators and Representatives for this session shall commence from the day on which the constitution of California was first communicated to the two Houses of Congress, respectively."

It applies to that appropriation alone, and the proviso certainly cannot, by any sort of construction, be made to extend to others. If it had said the mileage shall hereafter be computed by such a route, there might be some reason for the construction, but it is a proviso that the mileage provided for in this deficiency bill shall be computed by such a route.

Mr. ORR. I had marked a clause in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of the last session to which I wished to refer, but I cannot now lay my hand upon it. It was, however, the clause to which I have already adverted, providing that land warrants shall not be located upon any lands except those surveyed at the time the bill was passed. By looking at the phraseology it will be found, that that proviso comes in in precisely the same way that the proviso comes in in this deficiency bill.

But the point to which I called the attention of the House when I first rose, and which I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee has answered, was this: After providing that the rate of mileage shall be ascertained in a particular way, the law then says, that the per diem for this session, and so forth, showing that it was evidently the intention of the law-makers to restrict the latter clause of the proviso, and that the first clause of the proviso was to be general in its operation.

If I am correct in the construction which I have given to this act, then the Committee on Mileage should have ascertained the mileage due to the Delegate from the Territory of Oregon according to the terms of this act, and that is by the overland route; and they should have ascertained the mileage due to the Representatives from California according to the same route. And if the House should concur with me, that the construction which I give to this act is the true construction, and that it is a permanent and not a temporary provision, then a simple resolution of the House so construing the law, is all that will be necessary, and directing the committee to reverse the decision made in its construction.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On yesterday I was inquired of by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Woodward,] whether the general law of 1818 did not limit the mileage of members to the amount of their per diem. At that time, I stated very confidently that no such provision was to be found in that law. I will now read the section of the law. It is as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That at every session of Congress after the said third of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, each Representative and Delegate shall be entitled to receive eight dollars for every day he has attended, or shall attend, the House of Representatives, and shall also be allowed eight dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and that all sums for travel already performed, to be due and payable at the time of passing this act. And in case any representative or delegate has been, is, or shall be, detained by sickness, on his journey to or from the session of Congress, or, after his arrival, has been, is, or shall be, unable to attend the House of Representatives, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance. And the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as a representative, eight dollars for every day he has attended, or shall attend, the House: Provided always, That no Representative or Delegate shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of eight dollars a day, from the end of one session to the time of his taking his seat in another."

Mr. STUART, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have only a few remarks to make, but I have no objection to give way for an adjournment.

[Cries of "Go on!" and "Oh, no!"]

Mr. H. I give way to the gentleman from Michigan.

On motion by Mr. STUART,

The House adjourned until to-morrow.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM KOSSUTH.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the motion to print a letter of Louis Kossuth to the President of the Senate, pro tem., together with a copy of a communication addressed by him to the President of the United States, have directed me to report in favor of printing the same.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the vote upon the concurrence in that report is taken, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the subject. I, as an individual Senator, am opposed to the printing of these letters; and I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to it, as Senators do not usually give their attention to these reports unless it is specially called to them. The motion is to print matter which I think is not at all necessary for the public interest. It is a subject upon which we have already had so much printing and so much talking here, that I think it is time, with all deference to the opinions of others, that it should be disposed of finally, and not printed or talked about any more. I understand the usual custom is to submit a report for the concurrence or rejection of the Senate when it comes from the committee.

The PRESIDENT. Generally speaking, it is taken up as soon as the report is made. The question, then, will be on concurring in the report of the committee.

Mr. BADGER. I really hope the Senate will not concur in the report. I was in hopes that we had got rid of this subject after the military appearance which M. Kossuth made in this Hall some time ago, and that he would not be presented here again, in his literary character. I move to lay the report on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a short time.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly, if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will renew it if the Senator will authorize me to withdraw it should any other Senator, for the purpose of making any remarks, desire me to do so.

Mr. BADGER. I withdraw it unconditionally.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe I have troubled the Senate as little as any member, in relation to the individual who has made this communication to the Senate. I do not recollect that his name ever passed my lips on this floor until this morning, when I made that report. The communication is at least from a very distinguished individual. There are those in this body who desire that it shall be preserved at length upon the records of the Senate. It comes within no rule which has been laid down by the Printing Committee, or by the Senate, in relation to printing; but it is a question which stands outside of all those rules. Taking, then, the character of the individual, and the disposition of many Senators to spread it upon the Journal, and there preserve it, a majority of your committee were in favor of printing it. I will consume no more time in talking upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT. It will not go on the Journal if it is ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not at length.

Mr. BADGER. I renew the motion to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. CHASE asked for the yeas and nays upon the motion; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Clemens, Dawson, Jones of Tennessee, King, Miller, Morton, Pratt, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, McKee, Norris, Seward, Smith, Soule, Stockton, Sumner, and Wade—24.

So the motion to lay the report on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now comes up on the printing of the communication on the report of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CHASE asked for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the vote is taken, I have one remark to make in opposition to the proposition to print. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that these letters have already been printed by the Senate; that they are printed now in the two newspapers which publish the official record of our proceedings here, and that the whole proceeding appears upon the Journal. By being published in the official report of our proceedings, those letters have as much publicity given to them as, I think, any reasonable man can require. This is a proposition to print these communications in pamphlet form, and make them one of our regular documents. To that I am opposed. It will incur but a small expense, it is true, but it will be giving an importance to the matter to which it is not entitled.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to my friend who is at the head of the Printing Committee, [Mr. BORLAND,] that to give publicity to the communication is not at all the object of this printing.

It is to have this communication from the Governor, or Chief Magistrate, of the independent State and Kingdom of Hungary, and the embodiment of the very principles of republicanism throughout the world, in our Congressional documents, to be handed down to posterity in company with communications of a similar kind which come to the Senate.

Mr. CASS. I am not going to argue this question at all, particularly on the issue made by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. This communication, as I understand it, is simply a letter of thanks from this gentleman to Congress for inviting him here. It is sent to us in the most modest and proper language. All that is proposed is, that we should show, upon our record, that we have received it, and given it that respect to which it is entitled. As the issue now is, to refuse to print it, is to reject it, and throw contempt upon the man. That I am not disposed to do.

Mr. BUTLER. I recollect that when the proposition was before the Senate to welcome Louis Kossuth, it was expressly disclaimed that it was with any view to address the Senate of the United States. It was to place it upon a parallel with the reception of Lafayette, which was a very high honor, I confess. I now understand this gentleman to have written to the President. So far as it was a private communication to the President of the United States, returning his thanks for honors which had been shown him by this Government and the people of the United States, there could be no objection to it; but when the President thinks proper to send a communication of that kind to the Senate, it is allowing this gentleman—Mr. Kossuth—to address himself indirectly to the Senate of the United States, and so far as this proceeding will do it, to obtain the sanction of this body, impliedly, to the doctrines set forth in that paper; for it is not a simple expression of his return of thanks to this body.

Mr. BADGER. By no means.

Mr. BUTLER. It must not go out with any such understanding. If it had been of that kind, I presume it would never have found its way here. If it had been a simple, modest return of thanks to the President of the United States, we would never have heard of that paper. But it is the vehicle, under the name of returning thanks to this Government, of the doctrine of this gentleman, and so far as we give our sanction to it, we are called upon to do it. In other words, we are called upon to take this paper from this ex-Governor, or gentleman who claims to be the Governor of a foreign country, and place it upon our archives as one of the documents of the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. It is a political paper.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a political paper to all intents and purposes. What effect it may have upon the public mind of the United States, or of Europe, I know not. But the object is, disguise it as gentlemen may, to send it forth with all the indorsement and imposing sanction that can be imparted to it by this body. It is not a simple return of thanks, as the Senator from Michigan calls it.

Mr. CASS. I did not intend to say another word. But, really, it seems to me to be a new idea, that because we print a paper, we advocate the sentiments contained in it.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say so.

Mr. CASS. I understood that that was the intimation of the honorable Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Very far from it. I attempted to be very explicit, and I said that this gentleman wanted this to be sent forth, by implication, under the sanction of this body. I did not say that, if we print it, we sanction the doctrines contained in it. I dare say some gentlemen are very willing to adopt them. I am not.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, when this communication was received yesterday by the Senate, it was addressed to you, as the President of this body. By yourself, as President, it was laid before us. It was read to the Senate, after the question upon reading had been put by the Chair, without objection. And then a motion was made by myself, that it should be printed; which went, in its regular course, and without objection, to the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing, this morning, has reported in favor of printing this document, and now, if the Senate refuse to print it, it will be taken as an act of discourtesy. I do not say that such will be the motive that will prompt Senators to vote against the printing; but it will be so taken throughout the country. I did not participate to any extent in the debates which arose in regard to the welcome reception of this distinguished man; but I know the sentiment which animates a large portion of the people of this country in regard to him. I know the sentiment which animates, especially, the people of my own State. They have received him with distinctions and honors, which have never before been paid to mortal man, but Lafayette. And, in that, sir, let me say, they have simply imitated the example of this Senate, which paid to him honors which it never before paid to any other man but Lafayette.

Mr. CLEMENS. Did not the Ohio Legislature refuse to pay his expenses?

Mr. CHASE. They did not; and I am happy that an occasion is presented for the contradiction of that rumor. And now, when this distinguished exile returns to us, modestly and courteously, his thanks for the honor we have done him, and the committee which has charge of this matter reports in favor of printing his communication, can we do less than print it? It seems to me that we can do nothing less, without discourtesy. I am therefore in favor of printing. And I am in favor of it for another reason. Because I would take every opportunity legitimately offering itself to avow my sympathy with that man and his mission, and my concurrence in the great general principles which he proclaims in the hearing of the American people. I think it is proper, Mr. President, since this question has assumed the shape it has, to renew the call for the yeas and nays on the motion to print.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will take occasion to say, in consequence of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio, that the communication was not addressed to the Presiding Officer of the Senate. There was a letter received from Louis Kossuth, addressed to me, and which he requested me to lay before the Senate, enclosing a communication which he had made to the President of the United States. He was informed, he says, by the Secretary of State, that that was not the proper course to be pursued, and that the President could not communicate it to Congress; and, in consequence of that information, as he states in his letter to me, and on advice from the Secretary of State, that he should adopt the course of addressing it to the Presiding Officers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, he did so. I hesitated for some time with regard to my duty to lay such a paper before the Senate. But, on consulting with others, I thought it was the best course to pursue.

Mr. BADGER. If there is any implication of discourtesy to Louis Kossuth in the Senate's refusing to print this document, the disrespect, I think, must be fairly attributable to the Senator from Ohio. When these papers were offered here yesterday, and read, everything was done with respect to them which was necessary to prevent any manifestation of disrespect on the part of the Senate. He thought proper, however, to make a motion to print the papers. They are of a character which the Senate is not in the habit of printing; and I believe the Senate has never received such papers before. We have papers laid upon our tables every morning by dozens, that nobody ever thinks of moving to print. But the Senator from Ohio, in his zeal to reflect the enthusiasm of his State in favor of Louis Kossuth, is not content with the papers being presented and read, but he moves to print them. Under the rules of the Senate, the motion was referred to the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing, animated, I suppose, by the same favorable disposition towards the enthusiasm which has sprung up in this country toward this great military chieftain, or warrior—but who, my friend from Alabama said the other day, was not great at fighting—report back the motion, and recommend that the Senate concur in it. Now, I say, that as there was, in my judgment, no propriety in the original motion to print, as it is not in accordance, as I think, with the usages of the Senate to print such papers—as the case is of a description peculiar and unusual in our proceedings—there is no disrespect offered to the person in question by refusing to print them. But if there be any disrespect, it is brought upon us by no action of the Senate at all, but in consequence of the motion made by the Senator from Ohio. For my own part, I wish that the records could be kept, as far as possible, clear of any further proceedings respecting this gentleman.

Mr. SEWARD. I have voted against the proposition to lay this motion on the table, and I shall vote for the printing of this communication. I was influenced, and am influenced, by considerations of respect and courtesy toward the distinguished personage from whom it proceeds. But I am influenced more by a consideration of the self-respect which I think the Senate owes to itself. The Congress of the United States, at a time interesting to the friends of liberty and free government throughout the world, sent a national ship to bring this personage from Europe to our shores. On his arrival here, the Congress of the United States, in the name, and in behalf of the American people, bade him welcome to the capital. He came here, and was received by Congress. Upon his departing, he addressed to the Congress a respectful note through the President of the United States; but formalities of etiquette prevented the President from sending it to Congress, and it is now respectfully submitted by the gentleman himself to Congress. It seems to me that a refusal to receive it can do no injury to him, but may impair our own self-respect. It is but courteous, under all the circumstances, to give a respectful congé to our guest. Congress having received this person as a guest, it appears to me, only acquires itself of an ordinary act of hospitality by receiving this communication. Under these circumstances, without all referring to the contents of the paper, or to the manner of the paper, I think it is our duty to receive it. I see nothing objectionable in the communication; but if there was, courtesy, under all the circumstances, would seem to make it our duty to receive it, however objectionable it might be.

Mr. RUSK. Did I understand the Chair to say, that this communication was not addressed to the Presiding Officer of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state again what is the true state of the case. The paper proposed to be printed, was addressed to the President of the United States. The Secretary of State, by letter, (as Louis Kossuth informs me in a letter, dated at Cincinnati,) informed him that the President declined to communicate it to the two Houses of Congress, as it was not exactly in accordance with usage; and he suggested to him the propriety of sending it to the Presiding Officers of the two Houses; in consequence of which he addressed a letter to me, stating this fact, and asking me to present it to the Senate. I presented the letter addressed to me by Louis Kossuth, together with the paper which was addressed to the President of the United States, and which the President had declined to lay before Congress, and had so notified Louis Kossuth through the Secretary of State.

Mr. SEWARD. Here is the letter, dated Cincinnati, Ohio, February 14, 1852, and addressed to the Hon. Wm. R. King, President of the Senate. It sets forth, that on the 12th of January, Kossuth addressed a letter to the President of the United States, and requested him to communicate it to Congress; and a copy of that letter is annexed to his communication to the President of the Senate, under the advisement of the Secretary of State. I will read that part of his letter:

"Not initiated into the diplomatic forms of the United States, I respectfully directed my farewell to his Excellency the President, and requested him to communicate my assurance of everlasting gratitude to the Senate and the House of Representatives."

"The Secretary of State had since the great kindness to inform me, though his letter has reached me but recently, that my request in respect to the communication would have been gladly complied with, if it were consistent with the accepted forms; and he suggested it to me, as a more appropriate way, to send copies of my address to the Presidents of the Senate and of the House."

"It is upon this suggestion of the Secretary of State that I have now the great honor to inclose the feeble expression of my everlasting gratitude and hope, with the request to have it communicated to the august body of which you are the President."

"Mr. President of the Senate, your most humble and devout servant,
L. KOSSUTH."

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to bring to the view of the Senate a remark made by this gentleman in the first paragraph of his letter to the Presiding Officer of this body. He says:

"Before I left Washington city, I felt myself bound by gratitude to return my warmest thanks to the Government and the Congress of the United States, for their generous patronage they had so kindly granted to me as to the humble representative of my country."

He speaks of our having received him as "the humble representative of his country." He has assumed, in that letter to us—what I did not intend, by any vote of mine, to do—that we recognized him as an official representative, or any otherwise as a representative, or that he had any country, contradistinguished from the one which exists under the Government of Austria. But, I suppose this gentleman has served his purposes very well, and has, in some measure, subverted the purposes of others, by being a political agitator. And it is in that point of view that he commends himself, I have no doubt, to many who vote for this.

The Senator from Ohio undertakes to say, that if we refuse to print this communication, it will be a discourtesy. Allow me to say, that when gentlemen make imprudent issues, and we are not disposed to sustain them and their issues, the retort is immediately made: If you do not do so and so, which we have tendered, and which ought not to be done, the reproach falls upon those who oppose imprudent motions of this kind, if you choose to call them so. It was an unusual thing to make a proposition to print a paper of this kind. It was an unusual paper. And if it did not come from Louis Kossuth, with all the associations connected with his doctrines and his name, I answer for it, that no such motion would have been made. Gentlemen cannot disguise the fact from the country, that the object of this motion is to give importance to this gentleman's mission, and, as far as a vote will go, to do it, to endorse his doctrines and to fortify his sentiments. I cannot, consistently with my regard for the dignity of this body, undertake to admit the opinions, much less sanction the interference—for interference it is—of this foreigner.

Mr. DOWNS. I have not entered into any discussion in relation to Kossuth; and I do not think I have any extreme opinions on any side of the question; but it really seems to me astonishing that opposition should be made to printing this document. The honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] thinks it is not such a document as it is usual to print. I would like that gentleman to say what the rule is on that subject?—what particular kind of documents is it confined to? It seems to me, that, instead of there being any technical rule on the subject, it is customary for the Senate to order such documents to be printed as they think will be useful, and ought to be preserved in the archives of the nation. We often print memorials, resolutions from State Legislatures, and many other documents containing facts worthy of preservation. Without giving any opinion as to the course of Kossuth, or anything connected with his visit to the United States, I must say that his visit, his reception and course here, form an interesting event in our history. Without expressing any approbation of his course, or any opinion in regard to it, I think it is but right and fair, when he is taking leave of us, that we should order to be printed and put on record his response. I do not feel myself responsible for anything he has said, if he has said improper things; but this is a part of the history of this transaction; and I cannot conceive why the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] and the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] should be so sensitive on this subject. They seem to be actuated by a kind of hydrophobia, as if everything relating to Kossuth had something injurious and poisonous about it. It seems to me, that if there is such deadly venom in everything connected with Kossuth, these two gentlemen ought to have discovered it a long while since; for we have been talking and speaking about Kossuth for half the session. We invited him here; we have had him among us; we extended to him the hospitalities of the nation; and now, when he appears in our midst to make his bow, are we to say that we will not accept it, but that we will shove him out of doors, and tell him he has no business here? That I take to be the position of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. BADGER. I think my honorable friend from Louisiana would find it very difficult to make out his proposition. He says that those of us who are opposed to printing this communication stand in this attitude: That we have invited Louis Kossuth here; that we have received him with hospitality; and that now, when he wants to make his bow, and proposes to take his leave, we tell him he shall not make his bow and take his leave, but that we will kick him out. How does that present the state of the case now before the Senate? I thought he had been here. I thought he had been received, and that he made his bow. I was not here on that occasion, but I suppose he desired to make his bow, and I am sure that ample opportunity was allowed him to make his bow; that he was allowed to retire out of the Senate; and that he was neither hurried nor kicked out. He now sends us a letter which he calls a letter of thanks. Assume it to be a letter of thanks. We have received, we have read it. And the honorable Senator says it is equivalent to kicking him out, when he wants to make his bow, if we do not print and preserve it among the archives of the country. It seems to me that that is a very strange interpretation of the matter. No incivility has been offered to this man. The Senate has received this paper, and it has been read at the desk. And it is said that we are now offering an indignity to him, equivalent to kicking him out, when he wants to make his bow and take his leave, because we object to printing the paper he has sent to us. We have not yet quite done what is incumbent upon us in this matter, and what I am ready to do at any moment; that is, to pay the expenses incurred by his reception here. But it seems to me to be making a most extravagant caricature of the position we occupy on this subject, to say that because we do not wish the communication to be printed, we are offering the indignity of refusing to let the gentleman make his bow and depart. I assure my honorable friend from Louisiana that no man in this country is more heartily willing to let him make his bow and take his leave of us and of this country, now and forever, than I am. I would instantly withdraw all objection to the printing, if the withdrawal and the printing would have that very salutary effect.

Mr. BORLAND. I have found it exceedingly difficult to accommodate my actions here to the wishes, I will not say caprice, of the particular friends of Mr. Kossuth. I certainly, from the beginning, had no intention or wish to treat him with disrespect; but on the contrary, to treat him with very great respect. To show that I did so, I myself introduced a resolution, which I thought a proper one, recognizing him as the guest of the nation; inviting him here to the capital; providing for his welcome when he got here; and I went a step further, and in order to complete the whole business at once, and to make it substantial as well as formal, I provided in that resolution to pay the expenses which might be incurred in consequence of his reception. How was that proposition received? I was told by the peculiar friends of Mr. Kossuth—particularly by one gentleman who seemed to have him in special charge, and who on that occasion seemed to consider himself the especial guardian of Kossuth's honor and wishes, in this country—that I had offered a monstrous indignity, and grossly insulted Mr. Kossuth by mentioning money in connection with his name, in order to pay his expenses. I find, however, that other friends of Mr. Kossuth have since brought forward, in a separate form, the proposition which I then made, and which I was anxious should be adopted then. I did not wish to have this individual before us so often. I thought those who had due regard for his reputation would rather preserve it, by not allowing him to come before the public so often as to become so common as to cease to be interesting. I wanted to treat him with respect, and to provide for meeting the expenses which might be incurred in consequence of treating him with respect. I wished to dispose of the whole matter at once, and be done with it. Although I was then charged with treating him with disrespect, because I provided for taking care of him and paying for him in a substantial way, I am now charged, and others who agree with me are charged, with treating him with disrespect in another way—because we will not consider him further. It was disrespectful to provide for his respectful treatment; and now we are treating him with disrespect because we are unwilling to have any more to do with him. And one Senator has told us that the self-respect of the Senate requires this. I am afraid there is too much "respect" in this whole matter; and I am fearful it respects things with which the Senate has nothing to do, and with which it ought not to occupy itself.

Mr. CLEMENS. I cannot say, as many of those who have preceded me have said, that I have had nothing heretofore to say about this man, Kossuth. I have had a good deal to say about him; and I shall have a good deal more to say. There is a little resolution lying upon the table, very innocent upon its face, about which I shall have a good deal to say when it comes up for consideration. I shall then draw a parallel between the action of the Senate on two different occasions. I shall remind the Senate that, just a few days before the adoption of their first resolution upon this subject, a poor old woman, the only child of a revolutionary soldier, came here and asked for bread to support the little remnant of her existence, and you gave her a stone. Now it is proposed to pay to this man and his suite more money for Champagne and Burgundy, drank in one day, than would have supported that poor old widow double the remnant of her life. But that is not the question on which I wish now to speak.

I want to know the use of printing this letter. What use are we to put it to? How are we to use it? In what manner is it to be employed? The Senator from Louisiana asks, by what rule are we governed in ordering the printing of public documents? Why, we are governed by one plain, unvarying rule; and that is, when a document is presented here, upon which the action of the Senate is required, it is printed for the use of the Senate; it is printed to enable us to act understandingly on matters submitted to our consideration; and for no other purpose. Is it proposed to take any action upon this letter? Not at all. Why, then, is it to be printed? For our information? Why, all of us, who ever intended to read it, have read it long ago. All of us who chose to swallow its doctrines, have swallowed them long since. We all know every word that is to be printed and laid upon our tables. Then it is not for information; it is not for the purpose of enabling us to act understandingly upon the subject; but it is for some other purpose. What is that purpose? As a mark of respect? We have paid him all the respect he deserved; yea, more, in my opinion, than a hundred such men deserve. We have gone to the utmost limit in that respect. We have paid him the same honor which we paid to Lafayette; and respect can go no further. There is still another thing sought to be accomplished. It is to commit this Senate to the opinions and doctrines which have been advanced by him. I shall engage in no such business. And let me warn those gentlemen who are so exceedingly anxious now to make capital out of this Kossuth humbug, that it is a dead humbug, and cannot be galvanized into life. The man, or the party, who shall connect himself or itself with it, will go down as certainly as that the sun will rise to-morrow. It is a dead humbug, and cannot be galvanized into life.

Mr. DOWNS. If the humbug is dead, as the gentleman supposes, why is it that gentlemen oppose so strenuously this motion to print? It is not quite so dead, as some of them seem to suppose. As to the effect of a refusal to print the document which is now before us, the Senator from North Carolina and myself are not perhaps likely to agree; but notwithstanding the ingenious manner in which he has replied to my suggestion, I think it will be considered pretty much in the light I viewed it. There are some few circumstances connected with this subject which I did not think it was necessary to mention before, but to which I will now call the attention of the Senate. One is this: Gentlemen were so very cautious in the admission of Kossuth, in the programme of arrangements on that occasion, that it was a sort of dumb show. No opportunity of reply or address was given to him. He had no opportunity of returning his thanks in the usual way at the time of his reception. It seems to me that we ought to give him some opportunity of returning his thanks for the hospitalities tendered to him.

Another circumstance which shows that to refuse to print this communication would be a refusal to receive his bow at departing, is the fact that it was addressed to the President of the United States before Kossuth left this city. It was written here in Washington city before he departed. This shows that it was his parting bow. Let the gentleman from North Carolina construe it as he will, this is the response of Kossuth, on his leaving Washington, to the hospitalities extended to him while he was here. And I say again, that if the ordinary course which is adopted when documents are presented here which are supposed to be interesting and which it would be useful to preserve, is not pursued with regard to this communication, it will be considered that we treat Kossuth with discourtesy.

As to the subject to which the Senator from Alabama has referred, when it comes up, it will be a matter for separate consideration. I do not now pretend to say what course I shall pursue on that subject; but I can very well conceive that the question involved in that resolution is very different from that now before the Senate.

Mr. CHASE. In submitting this motion, I had not the slightest idea that I was about to give occasion to a protracted debate; nor in the suggestions which I made, did I suppose I was giving just occasion to any one to say, that I charged the Senators who opposed this motion with intentional discourtesy. But when it is asked, what is the use of printing this document? I answer, that the use of it is to complete the record; it is to fulfill the obligations which the Senate took upon itself, when it determined to welcome this illustrious man. We have received him; we have paid him honors. He now returns to us his grateful acknowledgments. The communication in which he embodies them, was addressed originally to the President of the United States. By the President, through the Secretary of State, he was informed that the President, in the ordinary course, cannot transmit such a document to the Senate. He then, upon the suggestion of the Secretary of State, inclosed it to the Chair. The Chair received it. It was read to the Senate, and then the Senator from North Carolina, with that manner for which he is so remarkable—which gives point and force to censure and satire, conveyed in the language of commendation and praise—took occasion to say, that as we had all heard the document read, and as it had no doubt duly impressed upon all a profound sense of the importance of the subject which it discussed, and the sentiments which it promulgated, he would move that it lie upon the table. It then seemed to me due to courtesy, due to our own self-respect, that this document should be printed. I therefore made the motion to print. I am glad to find that the majority of the Committee on Printing concurred with me in opinion.

Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the principles which have been advanced by this illustrious man. They are before the country. The people are thinking of them, and they will decide whether or not the requests which he makes of the American people, and through the American people of their representatives, is reasonable and ought to be granted. Other occasions will arise when those questions can be properly discussed. The Senator from Alabama says that Kossuth has already received more honors than he has deserved. That is a question between that honorable Senator and a very large portion of the people of the United States. I am much mistaken if it does not turn out to be a question between the honorable Senator and history itself. But be that as it may, I shall not go into the discussion now. In moving to print this document all that I have asked of the Senate is simply that they will close the record of the transactions connected with the welcome and reception of Kossuth in the most appropriate manner, by receiving with attention and respect the parting words of the gentleman whom they have chosen to honor.

Mr. RUSK. I do not intend to engage in this discussion; but I must say that it seems to me that this man Kossuth is a little like Falstaff about wit; he has not only a good deal of talk in himself, but he is the cause of talk in others. I have had nothing to do with this matter from the beginning, because I thought we had business enough of our own to attend to without attending to Hungary and Kossuth, and I was very anxious to get up a bill this morning of some importance. I shall vote against the printing of this letter, for I do not know how many more will follow it. I believe I have voted against everything of this kind hitherto, and I am strongly tempted to change my course and vote for this motion, on the ground on which this matter is put by the honorable Senator from Michigan, as a specimen of the modesty of Kossuth. As that is a scarce article, and this is a rare specimen of it, I have a great mind to change my opinion. But as I am anxious to be done with this whole matter, I believe I shall still vote against the motion.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator from Ohio has referred to a remark which I made yesterday, at the conclusion of the reading of the letter of Kossuth, that inasmuch as it had been read and listened to with profound attention by the Senate, unless the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] or the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] or the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] desired some reference of it, I would move to lay it on the table. Why, my remark was perfectly well understood by every gentleman in the Chamber and in the galleries. My meaning was this: that although this paper was directed to be read by the Senate, so far as I could judge there were not half a dozen members of the body who paid the slightest attention to its reading, thus manifesting beyond all dispute that the reading of the paper was a mere idle ceremony, and that nobody here wanted to hear it. That is what I meant. And now permit me to say, that I consider the motion to print as standing precisely on the footing of the proceeding to read. Nobody cares one copper about the printing of this paper. No one supposes it is worth one chincapin now or hereafter to the American people. It is to be printed for other purposes and other ends.

A word now with regard to the remark of my friend from Louisiana, that there are some considerations to which I have not adverted which would perhaps induce a different view of the propriety of printing this document, and lead me to believe with him that a refusal to print it would be an indignity. I wish merely to remind the Senator, that in reference to Kossuth's reception on this floor, it was arranged by a committee of very distinguished gentlemen who had charge of that subject, to put it precisely on the footing of the reception of General Lafayette. General Lafayette, when introduced into the Senate, did not open his mouth. He was simply introduced by the Presiding Officer, took the seat assigned to him, and the Senate adjourned, and he was introduced to its members in their private and individual capacities. The committee resolved to preserve a precise accordance with what had taken place in the reception of General Lafayette in this Chamber. Now, surely doing that cannot be tortured into discourtesy to Louis Kossuth. Surely he sets up no higher claims to the admiration and gratitude of the American people than General Lafayette. For what should we admire him more? Has he higher and nobler qualities than one of the most gallant and noble men that ever sprung from a nation of gallant and noble men? Has he any greater claims on our gratitude? What has he done for us? Nothing. He has come here and lectured our people, and through them he has lectured us in order to give us a new edition of political rules by which our conduct with foreign Powers is to be regulated. It seems to me he can have no claim upon us either for admiration or gratitude higher than Lafayette. Did General Lafayette send a letter to the Senate? Was any letter of his printed?

Mr. DOWNS. I would ask the gentleman whether, if there had been a letter from Lafayette, its printing would have been refused?

Mr. BADGER. I will not make such a supposition with respect to General Lafayette, because it would suppose General Lafayette to be deficient of a quality which he possessed in an eminent degree. He was a gentleman of real merit and real modesty. He was not disposed to thrust himself in with his political opinions, lectures, or dissertations, on what he thought ought to be the policy of this country, by letters addressed to the public authorities, or speeches made to the people. He behaved in that transaction of his life as he did in every other. It was the middle of his life, suitable to its commencement, and harmonizing gloriously with its termination—always able, patriotic, brave, and modest.

Mr. DOWNS. If there is anything in this document calculated to be construed into a lecture, then I concede it would not be improper to oppose its printing. But I am sure that there is no such thing in the letter before us.

Mr. BADGER. I can point out one at once. In that letter he states that the United States had sent "a steam frigate to Asia in order to restore me to liberty and activity." We all know that the correspondence of the Executive Department of this Government directed the representation on which his release was to be asked of the Sultan to be, that the object was to bring him here as a settler among us, as an emigrant, and to remove him from activity and power for political agitation.

Mr. DOWNS. It was not intended to confine him when he got here.

Mr. BADGER. No, sir; but I suppose the honorable Senator knows what Kossuth means by being restored to activity. He means that we intended to restore him to liberty, and not to a quiet retreat in this country, but to activity as a political agitator. His conduct here shows the interpretation which he means to attach to the term.

Mr. DOWNS. Even if the sentence to which the Senator from North Carolina takes exception bears the interpretation which he gives it, still it does not amount to a lecture. It is a mere statement of his impression of the transaction. I hope the gentleman will not consider Kossuth as delivering a lecture, because he takes a different view of that transaction.

Mr. BADGER. It is not the true view.

Mr. SOULE. We are exhibiting, I should think, Mr. President, a very unusual, and certainly a most uncalled-for, degree of susceptibility with respect to the motion now before the Senate. What does it aim at? Simply at the printing of a communication which was transmitted on yesterday to this body through the medium of its Presiding Officer. The communication itself emanates from the distinguished individual whom, by previous resolves, this Senate, acting in conjunction with the House of Representatives, had constituted and proclaimed as the guest of the American people; and the question arises whether or not that communication shall be printed. Let us consider on what grounds is the motion to print resisted. From the remarks that have fallen from the lips of certain Senators, it would seem as if the printing of the document in which the communication is contained was to impart to that communication a character involving us in high and momentous responsibilities, and indeed making the advocates of the measure personally accountable for the opinions and doctrines which the document may contain. Sir, it is now clear, and I will not dispute with those who may choose to deny it, that such can be neither the bearing nor the effect of our action on the proposition upon your table. We give it not any sanction. We print it, and that is all. What may be the judgment which the present generation will pass upon the merits and worth of the illustrious exile, and what rank will be awarded to him in history among the apostles and martyrs of the cause in the defence of which he is pouring out his whole soul, it is not for me now to investigate and determine. That question will have its day, and shall in time be met. But I can hardly conceive that we should at this moment inquire what be the character that gives Kossuth any right to address the country, and to address us on the occasion which has elicited this document. Sir, he came not an uninvited and unknown wanderer to our shores. He came hither by the wishes of the American people, signified to the world through their constituted organ, the Government; and it were more than strange, indeed, if after you had reclaimed him from exile, and welcomed him to your land, to your capital, to the very halls of your parliament, you should now deny him the privilege of returning thanks for the hospitality and the honors you were thus pleased, and with lavish hands, indeed, to bestow upon him. What can be the object of such a denial? Senators admit that it is no longer in our power to blot out of our recorded proceedings the dreaded document. It went to the Journal on yesterday upon being read by your Secretary, and there it must remain, in spite of the fate which may await this motion. Sir, allow me to say that it would be past strange in us to minister such an undignified rebuke to our former proceedings. To those who can see but a dead humbug in the document upon your table, and in those monuments of burning eloquence that have roused hundreds of thousands of our people to an enthusiasm approaching almost to frenzy, I would ask leave to say, Why should that dead humbug move you out of propriety and moderation? Fear you that the lurid carcass may haunt you at night, and disturb the quiet of your dreams? Sir, I am an unbeliever in the power of ghosts to do mischief. There are others who apprehend danger from the influence which may be exercised over our future destinies by the doctrines which have been lately, and are still now, proclaimed by that inspired missionary of freedom, and who presume that it may be in their power, through the negative virtue of a dissenting vote, to stem that torrent of thought and of wild wisdom, as some would call it, which is now flooding the land. Let me tell them to be composed and resigned. It were in vain—yes, in vain—that they would attempt to compress the surges of the popular sentiment. They will rise in spite of their efforts to avert a fantastic danger.

Sir, it is idle to struggle against public opinion. The power exists not that can isolate the policy of this Government from the conscience of the nation. I shall vote for the printing.

Mr. CLEMENS. The Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SOULE,] is totally mistaken as to the grounds taken by the opposition to this measure. He says that some of us have denounced it as a dead humbug. I did say so, and I say so again. That is my opinion. But no one has intimated here, as the Senator from Louisiana seems to suppose, that there was danger of the sentiments contained in that letter creating an unwholesome state of feeling in the public mind. No one has been foolish enough to intimate anything of that sort. There is not a sentence in the letter, there is not an idea advanced in it, which has not been published over and over again; which has not been strewn from one end of this Union to the other. There is nothing in it which can do harm; or if there is, the harm has been done already. Like the Senator from Louisiana, I am willing to trust to the people. I am willing to trust even to the first impulse of the great mass of the people. I do not require that you should wait even for the sober second thought. Collect the people of this Union together, and let them vote this day, and there is not one twentieth part of them would sustain the doctrines Kossuth has advanced.

It is from no apprehension either of the people or of Louis Kossuth, that we have opposed the printing of this communication. The Senator has misunderstood us entirely. What we do contend for is, that there is no necessity for the printing of this document; that it does not distribute information. He does not ask us to distribute it among the people. We are asked to print it for our own information. Who of us will be informed by it? Who of us does not know every word that it contains? What have we to dread by its publication and its distribution here in this Senate Chamber? This is an unnecessary expenditure of the public money. This printing is useless. It is for no object. It is a waste of the public money, and that is the ground of the objection which has been urged against it.

Whatever might be my feelings towards this individual; whether I entertained for him a very high or a very low degree of respect, I should still oppose the printing of this communication. It is what Lafayette never asked. It is something unusual, out of the course of business, without an object. I cannot comprehend it. What are we to do with the document after it is printed? You do not propose to print enough to distribute through the country. You communicate no information to the country. You simply lay it on your own desks and require the Committee on Printing to incur the expense of furnishing you with the information which has already been furnished over and over again. That is the objection to it. I have no fear of any consequences which may flow from it. We cannot suppress it if we desired to do so. We do not want to suppress it. I want it to go abroad through the land. I want every freeman in this Republic to read this letter. If some of them have been deluded heretofore, I think it will go very far towards banishing their delusion.

The question was then taken on the motion to print, and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bright, Broadhead, Cass, Chase, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Gwin, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, McKee, Norris, Seward, Smith, Soule, Stockton, Sumner, and Wade—21.
NAYS—Messrs. Aitchison, Badger, Bell, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Clemens, Dawson, Fish, Geyer, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, King, Miller, Morton, Pratt, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—20.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. SEWARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to incorporate the Sisters of Visitation of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

REPORT OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, showing the amount received for postages collected and postage stamps sold during the quarter ending the 30th September, 1851; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed.

TREASURY CONTRACTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the contracts made by that Department during the year 1851; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed.

DRAWBACK UPON FOREIGN MERCHANDISE.

The bill extending like privileges to those conferred by the act entitled "An act allowing drawback upon foreign merchandise exported in the original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fé, in Mexico, and to the British North American Provinces adjoining the United States," approved March 3, 1845, to foreign merchandise exported to Mexico by certain indicated routes, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

MILEAGE OF DELEGATE FROM OREGON.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill entitled "An act to regulate the mileage of the Delegate from the Territory of Oregon," and requesting the concurrence of the Senate therein.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the Senate for an hour; and, without finishing, yielded to the request of Senators, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 18, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order to be engrossed and read a third time the bill regulating the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon; and upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KING, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill to provide for the holding of the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges. I ask that it may be read for information.

It was read by its title, as follows:

An act amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," approved July 29, 1850.

Mr. OLDS. I asked yesterday for leave to introduce a report from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, equally important with this report, which was objected to.

Mr. KING. I hope this will not be objected to. It will delay the House but a moment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BOWIE. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not press that call now.

Mr. JONES. I shall object to every bill which is sought to be introduced by unanimous consent. Bills introduced in that manner have already consumed a greater portion of the time of the House. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BOWIE. I only desire to withdraw some papers from the files of the House, for the purpose of having them referred to the Senate.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers of Zachariah Walker, for the purpose of referring them to the Senate.

MILEAGE OF THE DELEGATE OF OREGON.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the subject of regulating the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When I gave way on yesterday for a motion to adjourn, I was replying to the interrogatory put to me on the day before by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD.] He asked if the general law of 1818, regulating the compensation of members of Congress, does not limit the mileage of each member to the amount of his per diem. I had answered that I thought there was no such limitation, when my colleague [Mr. FITCH] rose in his place and stated that the mileage of members of Congress, under the existing general laws, could not exceed the per diem allowance. I have examined the provision to which he alluded, but I find no such limitation. The only portion of the law which relates to this question is the following proviso to the section which I read, viz:

Provided always, That no Representative or Delegate shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of eight dollars a day, from the end of one session to the time of his taking his seat in another.

Taken literally, this language includes both per diem and mileage, and would limit the entire compensation to such sum as a per diem of eight dollars would amount to during the recess between the two sessions of a Congress.

Mr. WOODWARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] stated the effect of this provision correctly day before yesterday. He stated that the effect of that clause was to provide that the mileage and compensation of members shall not exceed the aggregate sum of eight dollars per day for the three hundred and sixty-five days, and I think that is the correct statement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that construction of the proviso cannot be sustained. The language does not import that, nor has it ever been so construed. There is a provision in this statute which enacts that in case any Representative or Delegate be detained by sickness on his journey to or from the session of Congress, he shall be entitled to his per diem compensation since the enactment of the law. The construction of the proviso has been, that it is a proviso to this portion of the statute, and restricts and limits the mileage given under it, and that the per diem allowance of a member who is taken sick upon his way to Congress or on his way home, shall not exceed what his per diem would have been during the vacation. I say that has been the construction put upon the proviso since its enactment, and I have no doubt that if it means anything, this is what it means. Then, sir, the law stands in reference to every member of Congress—every Representative of a State and every Delegate from a Territory, with one single exception, that they shall receive eight dollars per day for every day they serve in Congress, and eight dollars for every twenty miles distance between this Capitol and their places of residence. This, I say, is applicable to every gentleman upon this floor, and to every Senator, with one single exception; and that exception the Committee on Mileage by the pending bill have proposed to remove.

Mr. SMART. I desire to inquire whether this limitation does not extend also to the Delegates from New Mexico and Utah?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The limitation extends in terms, but not in effect. The compensation of the Delegates from Utah and New Mexico does not amount to $2,500 under the law of 1818; so that the limitation does not apply to them at all.

Mr. SMART. I called at the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms this morning, and I understood him to say that the Delegate from Utah had drawn his mileage up to the utmost limit of $2,500.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I desire to say that I have not drawn that amount.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman from Utah tells me that his mileage amounts to $2,100 under the law of 1818, and that he has drawn that amount. At the first session of the Thirty-first Congress a law was passed entitled "An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for pay and mileage of members of Congress for the present session." The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] a lawyer of high standing and reputation in his own State—and his reputation is not confined to his own State—gave it as his opinion that the proviso to that law is permanent in its effect, and that it now regulates the compensation of the Delegate from Oregon. I will read the law so far as it applies to this question. The title is, "An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the pay and mileage of members of Congress for the present session." The first section is as follows:

"That the sum of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of mileage and per diem of the Senators, members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, at the present session: two thousand three hundred and thirty dollars for additional expense of stationery for members of the House of Representatives, during the present session: Provided, That the mileage of the Senators and Representatives from California, and the Delegate from Oregon, be computed according to the most usual traveling route within the limits of the United States; and the per diem of said Senators and Representatives for this session shall commence from the day on which the Constitution of California was first communicated to the two Houses of Congress, respectively."

It is this proviso to this appropriation bill which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] thinks now regulates the compensation of the Delegate from Oregon.

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact in the act which that gentleman has just now read. In every clause of that act there is a special reference had to this session. For instance, the sum of $160,000 is appropriated for the payment of mileage of the Senators and members at the present session—for $2,000 at the present session; but the mileage which is in the proviso, the present session is not introduced. In the last clause of the proviso, however, relating to the per diem compensation of members, the present session is again introduced. So that the act indicates clearly, according to my conception, by its reference, in every provision and in every clause, except this one, that the appropriation is made for the present session, and even in the latter clause of this proviso it is introduced, while the provision for the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon remains general, that that proviso was designed to remain permanent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I should have been glad if the committee could have adopted that construction of this provision, for then this question would not now have been before the House. But, sir, of what is this a proviso? It is a proviso to a law which is for a special purpose, and temporary in its operations. It is a proviso to an appropriation law, and more, sir, to a deficiency appropriation bill. And what is a proviso in a law? It is that which qualifies, or restricts, or construes that which precedes and forms the body of the law. This proviso is connected with what goes before; it is a qualification of it; else it is not a proviso. That gentleman, [Mr. ORR,] upon reflection, will recollect that it is a recognized and well-settled rule of construction, that a proviso to a statute, unless the words of the proviso indicate clearly and beyond all doubt another intention, cannot have an effect in point of time beyond the operation of the statute to which it is attached. This is an appropriation law to pay the compensation and mileage of members of Congress; and that appropriation is qualified by a proviso that the mileage of the Delegate from Oregon be computed by the overland route. That is what the statute means, in my judgment. I will read a part of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case analogous to this. It is the case of Minis vs. The United States, in 15 Peters, 423. The suit was brought by the United States against Minis, who was a surgeon in the Army, for moneys of the United States received by him as agent for the Government, but not disbursed by him. He claimed to retain it as commission upon moneys by him disbursed as agent for the Government in the removal of the Cherokee Indians from their residence on this side of the Mississippi to their residence upon the other side. The disbursements were made in the year 1836-7.

In 1835, there was a law passed "making certain additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for certain harbors, and for removing obstructions in and at the mouth of certain rivers, for the year in 1835."

The act which makes the specific appropriation contains the following proviso:

"Provided, That no officer of the Army shall receive any percentage or additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatsoever, on account of the disbursing any public money appropriated by law during the present session for fortifications, execution of surveys, works of internal improvement, building of arsenals, purchase of supplies of any description, or for any other service or duty whatsoever, unless authorized by law."

It speaks of disbursements of appropriation of that session, and then says that no additional compensation shall be made to any officer for any other services. Under that provision, the United States in that case claimed that no compensation should be allowed to this surgeon of the Army for those additional services rendered to the Government. The Court, speaking upon this subject, uses this language:

"The argument on behalf of the United States is, that this proviso, although found in a mere appropriation law of a limited nature, is to be construed, by reason of the words 'or for any other service or duty whatsoever, unless authorized by law,' to be permanent in its operation, and applicable to all future appropriations, where officers of the Army are employed in such service or duty; and that it appears from the record, that this was the very ground on which the Treasury Department rejected the claim of Doctor Minis for commissions. The same question has been made and fully argued in the case of Grainger vs. The United States, at the present term; and we have given it our deliberate consideration. We are of opinion that such is not the true interpretation of the terms of the proviso; and that it is limited exclusively to appropriations made at the session of 1835."

"It would be somewhat unusual to find ingrafted upon an act making special and temporary appropriation, any provision which was to have a general and permanent application to all future appropriations. Nor ought such an intention on the part of the Legislature to be presumed, unless it is expressed in the most clear and positive terms, and where the language admits of no other reasonable interpretation. The office of a proviso, generally, is either to except something from the enacting clause, or to qualify or restrain its generality, or to exclude some possible ground of misinterpretation of it, as extending to cases not intended by the Legislature to be brought within its purview. A general rule, applicable to all future cases, would most naturally be expected to find its proper place in some distinct and independent enactment."

I ask gentlemen to notice the language of the Supreme Court in that case. The terms of the act admit of no other reasonable interpretation.

"The office of a proviso"—to use the language of the court in that case—"is generally either to except something from the enacting clause, or to qualify or restrain its generality, or to exclude some possible ground of misinterpretation of it, as extending to cases not intended by the Legislature to be brought within its purview. A general rule, applicable to all future cases, would most naturally be expected to find its proper place in some distinct and independent enactment."

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] has referred to a provision to be found in the general appropriation bill of the last Congress. It is a provision found in connection with the appropriation for the public survey. It is as follows:

"Provided, That no land bounty for military services granted by the act of 28th of September, 1850, entitled 'An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have engaged in the military service of the United States,' or by virtue of any other act of Congress heretofore passed, granting land bounties for military services, shall be satisfied out of any public land not heretofore brought into market, and now subject to entry at private sale under existing laws."

Mr. Speaker, I say that is no proviso. That is legislation upon an independent subject, not in any way connected with the public survey. It does not limit the provisions of the law which precedes it, and does not exclude misconstruction. That proviso—it is called a proviso—does not perform the office of a proviso. I say it is an independent enactment upon an independent separate subject, and performs none of the functions of a proviso to the preceding enactment.

But I will not occupy any more time upon this subject. I will say that the Committee on Mileage, at the last session of Congress, gave the construction to the law which I have mentioned, that this proviso to the appropriation bill was temporary in its effect, and ceased to operate at the close of the session at which it was passed. I understand that the Judiciary Committee in the Senate gave it a different construction during the last Congress, but that that decision has since been reversed. But I am not certain upon that question. In reference to the compensation of the Delegate from Oregon, there is but one law, and that is the provision in the territorial bill.

Now, I desire to turn my attention for a few moments to the merits and demerits of the proposed bill. And first, sir, I do not advocate this bill, I did not report it, upon the ground that I approved of the existing law. I think that the law of 1818 ought to be amended, and I expect that the Committee on Mileage will make a report upon that subject. A bill is pending before the committee, and when the committee shall have come to a conclusion upon the subject, and decided upon their report, the matter will be brought before this House, and then I expect to give my views upon the question. I will say now that I am in favor of a change of the law, so that the compensation of the members of this House, so far as their mileage is concerned, shall be estimated by some direct route—by some route to be ascertained by another department of Government than by ourselves. I say it is not worthy of this body, that members of Congress should be called upon to decide their own compensation. And this is the great objection I have to the present law. To fix the service of his brother members is not a duty which any man desires to perform, and I wish to see the law changed so as to devolve this duty upon others than members. I would like to see the law so changed that the Post Office Department shall decide the mileage of members by the mail routes. And I would say further, if we shall adopt this system of direct routes, then, as a matter of course, the Delegate from Oregon will be governed by the same principle of legislation as other members. When we make this reform in the law, then we will bring the Delegate from Oregon and the members from California to the same principle of compensation with other gentlemen. If we have no mail route over the country we can establish some distance and ascertain the mileage to which they will be entitled by a direct route.

I will now notice some of the objections urged by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HEbard.] When I heard his speech yesterday I was not sure that I understood him correctly, but when I came to read his printed speech I find I did not mistake his language. He says:

"I do not know what injustice there is about it. I have not heard one gentleman, who has undertaken to show that the pay given to this Delegate from Oregon was not an equivalent for the service he renders here."

With regard to the question which the gentleman raises, and the proposition involved in his remarks, that we shall estimate each gentleman's compensation by the actual services performed here, I undertake to say that the honorable Delegate from Oregon has given an earnest to the country in his past services that the services which he shall render in future will be commensurate with the compensation to be given to him. And it is a singular question for the gentleman from Vermont to raise upon the distinguished Delegate from Oregon, whether he earns $2,500 or not.

We say the Delegate from Oregon is not adequately compensated, because he is not placed upon a level with the rest of us. We ask that he shall be placed upon the same platform with every other member of Congress. I would not ask the honorable gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HEbard] if his services are worth more to the country than the amount of his mileage and per diem. It is a question which I ought not to ask. It is a question, the answer to which might be embarrassing. I do not know whether it would hurt his feelings or not, or whether it would flatter the gentleman's constituents or not. It is a question which he ought not to propound in reference to the services of the honorable Delegate from Oregon. I say, sir, that the Delegate from Oregon has performed services for this country which gives us a good guarantee that he will compensate the country in faithful services for what shall be paid him under the general law.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEvens] argues that the Delegate from Oregon comes here with a vested right to $2,500 under the organic law of the Territory, and that the Government has a vested right to his services; and that if more than that sum is paid him, it is a gratuity.

If the honorable gentleman, by the use of these terms, means that the compensation of a member of Congress being fixed by law, cannot be changed during his term—that it is a fixed legal compensation, which Congress has no legal or constitutional power to alter, I do not agree with him. If he means that there is a moral obligation upon the Government, that the compensation of any pub-lie officer shall not be reduced during his term, I agree with him; but when he talks about vested rights—that Congress has no power to change the law compensating members of Congress, I do not concur with him. I understand him to be an advocate of reform upon the mileage question, but, under his doctrine of vested rights, I want to know when that reform could be brought about? When can we change the law and not affect the compensation of Senators. This law of 1818 regulates the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, and under the doctrine of the gentleman it cannot be amended so as to change the compensation of a Senator now chosen. Owing to the peculiar organization of that body you never could bring a law into force at a time at which it would not affect some man who was holding that office, unless, peradventure, you put its operation off six years. Then, perhaps, you might. The position the gentleman assumes forever forbids amendment of the present law. But Congress has never adopted his doctrine. In 1816 the compensation was changed so as to give a salary, and that was made to affect the members of that Congress. In 1818 that law was repealed, and the new law took effect during that Congress. I am not in favor, Mr. Speaker, I will here say, of imitating the example of these two Congresses, which I have mentioned. I am not in favor of amending the law so as to affect the compensation of Representatives during this session—during the same session at which the law is changed. Members ought not to legislate upon their own compensation any further than it is possible for them to avoid.

Again: the gentleman says the Delegate from Oregon came here under a vested right, knowing the law; and he dwells with some force upon the fact that the honorable Delegate was once the Governor of Oregon, and at the time the law was passed which changed the compensation of the delegate from that Territory. The present Delegate then was not the Governor of that Territory. Party proscription had driven him from that position to which his services to the country had elevated him. I will take that back, I will not charge it upon the party. I do not believe the Whig party is responsible for that odious act. I believe it was the personal feelings of the then incumbent of the presidential chair, which induced the removal of the honorable Delegate from his position. Difficulties growing out of the vindication which the honorable Delegate from Oregon had made of the Indiana troops against the report of their commander, caused his removal from that position. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] dwells upon the fact that the Delegate was Governor of that Territory, and knew the law. He quotes an old maxim of law, that all men are bound to know the law—a maxim under which unfortunate men were often executed in England when they were guilty of no moral offence—an axiom of law that every man is bound to know the law which prevailed in England when the statutes took effect and were in force from the first day of the session of Parliament. And the gentleman desires to adopt towards the Delegate from Oregon this iron and unjust maxim of the English law. So odious has this principle of the law been to the States of this Confederacy, that in a majority of them it has been provided in their constitutions, that no law shall take effect until it has been published, unless the public good or the exigencies of the times require it. The gentleman says that the Delegate knew the law. I say that honorable gentlemen upon this floor and committees of Congress differ in reference to the law giving compensation to that Delegate. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] thinks that his compensation is regulated by the law of 1850, while other gentlemen of this House think that the law organizing the territorial government governs his compensation. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania, although there is this uncertainty about the law, says that the Delegate is bound to know it. This law of 1850 had hardly reached Oregon when the gentleman was elected as the Delegate. He was not then Governor. He was a private citizen, and following his own pursuits, and not, I suppose, reading with great care the special appropriation bills of Congress—bills which very few men read. Then how was the Delegate to know what the law of compensation was? He knew that his predecessor had received $3,452 at the last session. He knew that his predecessor was not limited by the restriction of the territorial law, but that he received a mileage compensation. I therefore say, that the argument of the member has lost its force with relation to the compensation of the Delegate from Oregon. He was not expected to know the law more than gentlemen upon this floor who differ widely in respect to it. Now, I will briefly notice a few other arguments, and will then close. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] contends that the present mileage law is very unjust, very unequal, and that we ought not to compensate the Delegate from Oregon under that law. He says that it is unequal and unjust because one man receives more money from the Government than another. The dollars that we receive from the public Treasury is the rule by which he estimates the equality of position of honorable gentlemen. In my judgment there is another rule than the dollar rule which the gentleman mentions. We are equal when we stand upon the same law, when it prescribes our duties, defines our rights, and protects us. We are unequal when there is for one man one legislation, and for another man a different legislation. That is all I have to say in reference to that argument of the gentleman. Let us see how unequal the law is as it stands, and how much more unequal the gentleman would make it by the amendment he would propose. He says that all above the mere traveling expenses is to be regarded as compensation—as salary, and that that ought to be divided equally amongst the members of Congress—that above the actual expenses in approaching the capital and returning from it we ought to be equal. I think that would be a more unequal and more unjust law than the one at present regulating the compensation of members. The Delegate from Oregon has to come, in approaching this capital, more than seven thousand miles. It costs, the gentleman says, $300; and that $600 ought to be allowed him for coming and returning, and that all above that that he receives should be the same that a gentleman living within fifty miles of this capital would receive. How does he compensate the Delegate for the time spent in the journey? It takes from thirty-five to forty days to reach the seat of Government from that Territory, and by the overland route it would take several months. The gentleman would make no compensation to the Delegate for the time spent in getting here and returning home. There would be then three months of time for which he would receive no compensation. He makes no estimate in his rule of equality for the fact, that the Delegate must turn his back upon his family—upon his business. The gentleman from Georgia lives within seven or eight hundred miles from the capital. If the circumstances of his family required it—if no business of general importance was on hands, or if the interests of his constituency did not require him to be here—he might absent himself from the House—as I believe he did, during the first part of this session. I do not refer to the fact that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], were absent from their seats, for the purpose of criticism. They, no doubt, when they left their seats, felt it to be their duty to do so. They did not feel that they deserted their public duties by going. They were, on account of their living near the capital, enabled to go home within a day or two. They were able to leave the Halls of Congress, and go home to attend to their private affairs, and in the practice of the law to keep up their business. This, sir, I suppose is worth something to gentlemen living near the capital. I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not give up this advantage of his, in keeping up his business at home, for the whole mileage of the Delegate from Oregon. In his estimate, the gentleman from Georgia does not take that into consideration.

Why is it that we pay foreign ministers when they leave this country $9,000 going, and $9,000 returning, and $9,000 each year for staying? It is not merely to defray their expenses in going, because they can go to any court of Europe sooner, and at less expense and risk of life and health than the honorable Delegate from Oregon can come to this capital. It is not for that, then. It is not to enable them to imitate the courtly and costly fashions of Europe. Certainly it is for no such purpose. We compensate them thus largely because they have to leave their country, their family, and their business. The gentleman from Oregon is as far removed from his home and his business as any minister when he leaves this country and goes to any court in Europe, and yet the gentleman from Georgia would give him the same compensation as is received by a member living within thirty or one hundred miles of the capital. I have remarked that the law as it now stands compensates every member of Congress by a fixed rule—a per diem allowance and mileage, with a single exception, and that exception is made against the honorable Delegate from Oregon. We ask to remove this exception; and shall it not be removed? My colleague from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] on yesterday said no such exception ought to be taken prejudicial to the Delegate from Oregon—that his services to the country have made him the object of so much interest to the country that this exception to his prejudice ought not to be made. I think there is force in that suggestion. If we are going to make a discrimination against one man, let it not be against the Delegate from Oregon, who has rendered such distinguished services to the country. But I do not claim that this bill shall be passed upon that ground—that the Delegate from Oregon has made himself a name, and secured a place in the hearts of his countrymen by his gallant services. I ask it for no such reason. I ask that it shall be passed to place him upon an equality with the rest of the members of Congress—that he shall not be made an exception, but that his compensation shall be estimated by the same rule that regulates the compensation of the rest of the members of Congress. And then, Mr. Speaker, I will be in favor of amending the general law limiting the mileage by more certain enactments, and by such amendments the Delegate from Oregon will be equally affected with other Representatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The House have given this subject an importance which, in my humble opinion, it does not require; still, I believe it to be my duty to give the House and the country the reasons which have governed my vote. I would like to know what the inequality of mileage and the pay of members has to do with this question, abstractly and properly speaking? Nothing at all. No more than the gallant services of the gentleman from Oregon has to do with it. What has the great question of retrenchment, economy and reform, which was brought in by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS], to do with this question? Is there a solitary member who has addressed the House, but what admits that the present pay of members of Congress is wrong and improper, and ought to be remedied. I will not dispute but what that is the feeling of every gentleman who has addressed the House; but as acts speak louder than words, I would be pleased to see any gentleman who speaks of the want of attention to economy and reform, make a proposition to remedy this evil. Has a solitary proposition of this kind been made to remedy the evil? Not one. You cannot fix the system of mileage without producing injustice to some one, whether you fix it at two cents, at twenty cents, or forty cents per mile. The distance will make it unequal and unjust. If, then, it is an evil—if members are paid improperly, as we all believe—for I have been here seven sessions, and this question of mileage, like Monsieur Tonson, comes again before us, and we have had long and loud speeches upon it—why not vote to give a bona fide and proper annual compensation to all the members, with just enough to pay them their reasonable traveling expenses? Do that, and you will adjust this matter finally and permanently. Has anybody proposed it? Does the Committee on Mileage offer to apply the pruning hook to the evil of which we all complain? Not at all. The entire action of this House consists merely in complaints. Proper action will remedy the evil complained of. When Congress passed this territorial bill for Oregon, we all labored under the impression that this mileage system was wrong. For by it, the greater the distance the greater the injustice. And when you crossed the vast Rocky Mountains, and entered upon the Pacific border, in the formation of that territorial bill Congress put in a provision that the Delegates west of the Rocky Mountains should receive $2,500. It was a good beginning, and if it had been carried out and acted upon, I would have submitted to it

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 38.

most cheerfully. When Congress lost sight of this purpose, and permitted the two members upon this floor, and the two Senators from California, to receive their mileage under the law of 1818, and suffered this special law, creating a distinction against the Delegate from Oregon, to remain on the statute book, because you need reform, I say it is an act of crying injustice.

The Delegate from Oregon should not be excepted from the general law. If his pay were to amount to $100,000 under the principle of that law, yet it is the law, enacted for the purpose of regulating the pay of all the representatives, and should be general in its application. It should be adhered to in all cases or not at all. There is no justice in discriminating against the Delegate from Oregon. If the mileage is too high under the general law, introduce a bill which shall in its application be equal, uniform, and just to all the members and delegates, and I will vote for it. But I cannot consent to pay the gentleman from Oregon by a rule different from the one regulating the pay of all the members and delegates of this House. I know that members living near the Capitol complain, and justly, too, of their pay. It is unjust. Take my own case, and that of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] When the short session comes, I shall receive for the session $2,000, while my friend does not receive $800. Is it proper, just, and right? How, then, are you to remedy this matter? Let us pass this bill and place the gentleman from Oregon upon the same footing with all others; give instructions to the Committee on Mileage to bring in a bill, that will remedy the evil, by fixing a just annual compensation, and vote for it, relying upon the good sense and intelligence of the country to sustain it. Let us cease this eternal cry about our own pay, mileage reform, economy, and retrenchment, and go to work properly to remedy the matter. Some years ago in Congress there was a regular bill introduced, founded upon the estimates of the proper department, estimating the amount necessary for the annual expenditure of that branch of the Government, and every solitary member who made a speech cried out to the top of his voice economy, reform, and retrenchment, yet each member had an amendment to offer. I sat down and had the curiosity to keep an account of every one of these reform gentlemen. They proposed to give $3,500,000 beyond the estimates of the proper department in the name of reform. I know this is a difficult and perplexing question, and with due deference to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] who never fails to leave the impress of his powerful mind upon any question that he discusses, you cannot go properly to work now upon the question of economy and retrenchment, without you have proper aid in the departments. How is it to be expected, that members who come here, can in a session or two understand all the ramifications of your different departments and custom-houses in New York, and elsewhere. Consequently without proper information, the House would be voting blindly.

When William Henry Harrison came into power, the Whigs came here agreed upon the principles of reform, retrenchment, and economy. Many Democrats aided in the good work—being out of power they were perhaps willing to go for these measures, and for that reason they joined in with the Whig party; and, after a laborious session of three or four months here, the whole reform amounted to cutting down the regular printer and a few pages of the House. Sir, all the officers in the Government—the doorkeepers of the House not excepted—are better paid than you are. Suppose I am wrong, and that the pay of the Delegate from Oregon is just and proper, will this House contend for an isolated question at the expense of the feelings of the gentleman who represents that Territory? I say, if I was the representative of Oregon, or any other place, I would wish to be upon an equal footing with my associates upon this floor; and unless I were, I should resign and go home.

Mr. BISSELL. Under the impression that this question has been sufficiently discussed, I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; which main question was the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GOODENOW demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MEACHAM moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays upon that motion; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and resulted—yeas 84, nays 97, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, Charles Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Bartlett, Bennett, Bibbhaugh, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chapman, Chastain, Churchwell, Cleveland, Clingman, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Evans, Ewing, Fowler, Giddings, Goodenow, Grow, Hammond, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Houston, John W. How, Hunter, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, McMullen, Meacham, Miller, Mills, Miner, Morehead, Newton, Outlaw, Pennington, Perkins, Robie, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schockcraft, Schoonmaker, Skelton, Stuart, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Thaddeus Stevens, Strother, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Toombs, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, and Wildrick—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, David J. Bailey, Beale, Bell, Bissell, Bragg, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Colcock, Conger, Daniel, John G. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Holladay, Howard, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McCorkle, McDonald, McQueen, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Morrison, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Phelps, Porter, Powell, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Savage, Seay, Origen S. Seymour, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, St. Martin, Stuart, Townshend, Venable, Ward, Addison White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—97.

So the House refused to lay the motion upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the bill to a third reading.

The question was then taken, and there were yeas 95, nays 86.

So the vote was reconsidered.

The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is the previous question still in force?

The SPEAKER. It still operates.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The previous question was upon the reconsideration, and not upon the engrossment. It exhausted itself upon the engrossment.

The SPEAKER. In the recollection of the Chair, the vote by which the bill was put upon its engrossment, was under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. JONES. It exhausted itself when the House refused to engross it.

The SPEAKER. Upon a reconsideration, in the opinion of the Chair, it places the House precisely where it was.

Mr. JONES. How does it come, that this debate was had upon the motion to reconsider, if the previous question was still hanging over the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very well aware that this question has been decided variously. The Chair has stated his opinion. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. I will not appeal.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will take an appeal, and barely remind the Chair, that when the Texas boundary bill was under consideration, the previous question was applied to it, and the bill was rejected. It was reconsidered and amended on your motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware that such is the fact. The Chair is also aware, that in a majority of cases which he has looked at, the decision has been in accordance with the present decision of the Chair. It is a matter about which the Chair certainly has no pride of opinion. It is competent for the House to reconsider the ordering of the main question, which has been done over and over again in this body since I have been here.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to say this matter is open to debate, and I wish to say one word—

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of order. The question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable, but the Chair will be happy to receive suggestions from the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would like to know upon what principle it is not debatable. If it is settled that we are under the operation of the previous question, it is not debatable; but that is the very point we are about to determine, and I hope the Chair will allow a word or two of remark upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be happy to hear any suggestion from the gentleman, but debate is not in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not desire to go into a lengthy debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] appeals from the decision of the Chair, that the bill is now under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is that appeal debatable?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I shall ask the yeas and nays. I say that a different decision has been made heretofore.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states, for the correction of the gentleman, that he knows the fact, that the decision has been as the Chair has stated.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no doubt that such decisions have been made; but I also know that different decisions have been made.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] cannot find a single case as he states it. Whenever a bill is put upon its passage under the operation of the previous question, and the motion to reconsider is carried, we are put back exactly in the condition we were in before the bill was passed. If a gentleman wishes to amend it afterwards, he must move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That was not done in the case I referred to.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Chair decides that the previous question is now operating upon the question before the House, which is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. From this decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] takes an appeal.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw my appeal.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs, whether the bill shall be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. KING, of New York. Upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 88, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Beale, Bell, Bissell, Bragg, Breckinridge, Brenton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Colcock, Conger, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doty, Dunham, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Gilmore, Gorman, Grey, Hall, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Holladay, Howard, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, was read a third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The bill having been once reconsidered, cannot, in the opinion of the Chair, be again reconsidered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That very decision was overruled during the last Congress. The Speaker of the last House made that decision upon the Texas boundary bill, and the House overruled it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects that very well. The Chair is, however, of the opinion that a bill cannot be reconsidered a second time.

The question now being upon the passage of the bill,

Mr. HENDRICKS demanded the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be now put; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to reconsider the vote upon the passage of the bill, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF LANDS TO MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER stated, as the next business in order, the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, to grant the right of way and a portion of the public domain to the State of Missouri, to aid in the construction of certain railroads therein; and that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I dislike very much to ask permission of the House to do anything that is not strictly in order; but in view of the fact that this debate may occupy many days, I ask the House to allow me to report the Deficiency bill, which I have had in my possession for some days, and have been waiting for an opportunity to report.

Mr. KING, of New York. It is very true, as the gentleman says, that this debate will occupy several days; but I have been waiting for some days to report a bill of considerable importance, and have been unable to do so, and I therefore object to the introduction of this bill. I think the committees ought to be called for reports, and I will therefore move to postpone the consideration of the bill now before us until to-morrow morning, at such time as the call of the committees shall have been gone through with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot obtain the floor to make that motion without general consent.

[Cries of "Object!"]

Mr. KING. Then I must insist on my objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am a little astonished that the gentleman from New York should make objection, when it can only answer the purpose of putting my bill back, and cannot advance his.

I desire, however, to propound this question to the Chair: Whether the gentleman from Missouri, having yielded me the floor, it is competent to the gentleman from New York to deprive me of my right to introduce the bill.

Mr. KING. I have a right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama must remember that his proposition cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PHELPS resumed and concluded his remarks commenced on the 12th of February, in opposition to the pending motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and argued earnestly in favor of the measure. He insisted that Missouri has a just claim to lands to aid her in the construction of the railroads which are designated, and that she is entitled to grants similar to those which have been made to other States of the Union for internal improvement purposes.

[For the speech of Mr. P., see Appendix.]

Mr. WATKINS next obtained the floor, and said that the remarks which he intended to make, although they would have a general bearing upon the bill now under consideration, had reference more particularly to the bill providing for a grant of land to the State of Tennessee, to aid said State in the construction of certain railroads therein, and to the homestead policy. He maintained that according to official data the public lands cannot much longer be looked to as a source of revenue; he argued in favor of such a distribution of them among the States as would facilitate and aid the purposes of education and internal improvements, which are of the highest national importance, and giving homesteads to citizens of the country. If it is constitutional to appropriate a portion of the public lands, it cannot be less so to appropriate the whole of them, considering a large class of cases would be covered. One of the reasons which led him to this course is, that unless some such system be adopted the most fertile lands—the indications are unmistakable—will, in a very few years, be frittered away by partial, sectional, and local legislation.

[For the speech of Mr. WATKINS, see Appendix.]

Mr. MILLER next obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. YATES, on whose motion, The House adjourned till to-morrow.
